An influential leader of opinion in Quebec, Mr. Ryan has also gained national respect for consistently advocating moderation, balance, good government and the preservation of a French-Canadian identity.

In addition to his long-standing involvement with the French-Canadian question, and, indeed, the politics of Canada in general, he has had a long and intimate association with L'Action Catholique Canadienne, an organization which encourages open dialogue between the Catholic clergy and the laity. Mr. Ryan served as its national secretary from 1945 to 1962.

His impressive contributions to both his profession and his country have been recognized in such honors as the Human Relations Award of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, 1966; the Human Rights Award of the Jewish Law Committee of Canada, 1969; the National Press Club Award, 1965; and the Quill Award of the Windsor Press club in 1971. Mr. Ryan was named to the Canadian News Hall of Fame in 1968.

He has authored several books and is a frequent contributor to magazines and periodicals.

In March 1976, Mr. Ryan was at Queen's as the fifth Brockington visitor.

The baccalaureate service dates back 136 years when Queen's was a young university housing its two professors and 10 students in a rented building and offering less than 10 courses and only one degree—the bachelor of arts.

Sir Walter Perry

Open Education

by Terry Collins

The seventh Brockington visitor, Sir Walter Perry, vice-chancellor of England's Open University, will begin a five-day stay at Queen's University with a public address entitled, Changing Patterns of Higher Education, Monday, Feb. 14 at 8 p.m. in Grant Hall.

Throughout the week the British educator, who is recognized as one of the world's leading authorities on correspondence education, will meet students and staff in a series of informal discussions and seminars. Sir Walter will also give a luncheon address to the local Rotary Club and a panel discussion featuring community members involved in continuing education. It is appropriate that Sir Walter, a specialist in continuing education, should visit Queen's, a university which has offered correspondence courses to Canadians since 1890.

Sir Walter was appointed vice-chancellor of the Open University in 1969, two years before courses were offered to students.

With its administrative office situated near London, the Open University regularly mails materials to more than 52,000 students in all parts of Britain. BBC radio and television broadcasts, which complement written materials are periodically aired.

The Open University was designed to fill a large gap in the British higher education system by offering correspondence courses which would enable adults, studying at home, to earn a first degree.

Six undergraduate courses qualify a student for a Gen. BA degree—the average completed within a six-year period. In 1976 the Open University offered its students 90 credit courses in five faculties—arts, social sciences, educational studies, science and technology.

A number of "post-experience" or professional improvement courses, such as environmental studies, are also available.

While the ages of students vary from 21 to over 70, the average age is in the early 30s.

In the first years of the university's operation, the largest portion of applicants were teachers and other professionals upgrading their standards; now applicants in manual and routine occupations such as office workers, shop-clerks and housewives comprise almost one-third of the enrolment.

Sir Walter has always been a strong advocate of a university open to anyone, regardless of their formal academic background. In 1975, 35 per cent of new students registering, had less than the normal academic entry qualifications demanded by conventional British universities.

Thus, the Open University is proud that while many students enrol without formal qualifications, something like 50-60 per cent eventually earn a degree. Critics initially predicted a drop-out of more than 90 per cent.

Perhaps Sir Walter's greatest contribution to the overall success of the Open University has been in ensuring the academic excellence of the courses and degrees offered. From the beginning he has insisted that the Open University maintain the same high standards of traditional universities.

In spite of its effectiveness, the Open University has its critics who question the value of a university experience which does not include extensive contact with other students and faculty or the use of conventional laboratory facilities.

The Brockington visitation was established as a memorial to Leonard Brockington who served as rector at Queen's for 20 years. Individuals of international reputation are annually invited to campus to exchange ideas with members of the university community.

Africans speak on racism

by Paul Henderson

Southern Africa has been the focus of much world attention in recent months. To offer some insight into the present situation there, Chief Michael Zukumbuzya, High Commissioner for Tanzania in Canada, and Dudley Gibbs, member of the Committee for the Liberation of South Africa spoke at Queen's Monday evening in conjunction with the University's International Week.

Both speakers declared that in the name of equality, freedom and the dignity of man, the last vestiges of colonialism and racism must be eliminated from Africa. With specific reference to conditions in Southern Rhodesia, Nubia (South West Africa), and South Africa, Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Zukumbuzya deplored the repressive measures being used by the respective regimes to maintain their elitist positions. The white minorities, the High Commissioner pointed out, have institutionalized racism to an extent "beyond anyone's imagination," in fact, he continued, they have relegated the African to a "sub-human" status.

Pressured Smith

Change, however, is in the wind. Mr. Gibbs, in particular, described how the activities of the armed forces determined to free the people of Zimbabwe (Rhodesia), have pressured Prime Minister Ian Smith to accept some form of negotiation.

Meanwhile, the High Commissioner believes that a favourable outcome for the Africans is inevitable because no man will forever accept degradation and humiliation. Moreover, he preferred to see a peaceful solution to the situation, but he also felt that continued white intransigence is exhausting all patience. He said armed struggle appears to be the only way to success.

The AMS can't run without students.
Positions to be filled soon:

Assistant Commissioners

Outer Council Speakers

Great experience is not a pre requisite for these positions; a willingness to work and a responsible attitude are the most important qualities.

AMS Commissioners
Applications are now being accepted in the AMS office for the following positions:

Internal Affairs Commissioner

External Affairs Commissioner

Education Commissioner

Campus Activities Commissioner

Queen's Student Agencies Director

The term of office for these positions runs from March 1, 1977 to March 1, 1978.

Applications accompanied by a resume, should be addressed to Hugh Christie and submitted to the AMS Office before 5 p.m. on Tuesday, February 15th.

Students lose risky battle

by Donald Copeman

It was the fifth day of February in the year 1977. Throngs of blood-thirsty spectators gazed impatiently at the world map below measuring some thirty by forty feet, placed in the Common's amphitheatre at Ottawa's Carleton University where soon the Queen's Risk team of Don Copeman, Paul Jackson, Dave Cross and Rick Gillespie would begin their campaign of total world occupation through the annihilation of Central Canada's toughest strategy foursomes.

Five teams were to enter the first elimination round with only three surviving to the final. At 2:15pm, some fifteen minutes after the scheduled start of the match, four teams sat at their respective tables. The patience of these players was wearing thin and the Geneva Convention began mumblings of disqualification when off in the distance a lone piper could faintly be heard playing a Scottish war ballad.

Within minutes the Queen's team had entered Garbed in full Gaelic battle dress and brandishing their gleaming swords, they and their piper Ian Glass proudly marched before the honorable judges for a formal military salute. The tension had climaxed and the masses broke into a wild frenzy.

Approximately two hours later we had removed the last army of the fourth remaining team following Queen's Fifth Bamboo Division's onslaught from mainland China and the subsequent occupation of the entire European continent. It was time to prepare for the ensuing Armageddon the following day.

Seminar to examine town needs

More than 75 councillors, reeves, planning board members, community workers and concerned citizens from villages and towns throughout Eastern Ontario are expected to attend the second in a series of planning seminars at Queen's University this weekend.

Entitled, The Planning Needs of Villages and Towns, the seminar is scheduled for Saturday, Feb. 12 at 9:30 a.m. in the Donald Gordon Centre at 421 Union St.

The day-long program includes four morning workshops dealing with such issues as alternatives to growth; the necessity of water and sewer services; planning strategies for small centres; and the importance of Demonstrating their recognition of the advantage of the element of surprise, on Sunday afternoon the team repeated their precise military entrance with a major exception. Following the salute, Queen's field general promptly reeled and shouted his final command. Within seconds mayhem prevailed with the five members kicking high in a rather loud Oil Thigh. (for those of you who are curious about what the Scottish really wear under those kilts, thanks to a perceptive photographer you may receive the answer in a future edition of the Golden Words).

The final game did not turn out as well although at one point it seemed Queen's had at least second place locked up. Despite the fine efforts of the 56th Inca division which held the continent of South America and severely crippled the Concordia team, the Western Ontario team was handed the opportunity to crush everyone in a single turn. So it goes.

Special thanks to the War Games and Strategy Club, John Ryder-Burbridge, Dave Raeside and the Queen's band and the John Deutsch University Centre Program Committee for the funding.

Food week to study nutrition

February 11-19, 1977 has been designated Canada Food Week. For the first time in this country, we will have a chance to participate in food education and to initiate citizen-based national food policies. Throughout the country local groups are planning community activities which will focus on food issues: food supply and production, food in the market place and its lack of nutritional value and the control by a few large interests over much of the food we purchase.

The Canada Food Week coordinators argue that students should be concerned. Tuition is escalating as is the cost of food. At most Canadian post-secondary institutions, the student who must rely exclusively on the campus cafeteria, residence dining hall and vending machines for his or her fare is poorly nourished and economically abused.

The Canada Food Week Committee contends that this need not necessarily be so. Perhaps the best example of positive change is Yale University which has for many years now offered excellent vegetarian and natural food fare. Vending machines can stock yogurt, packaged unsalted nuts and dried fruit and seeds, fresh fruit juices, herbal teas and granola in addition to the ever popular chips, sweetened drinks, Vachon cakes and candy.

Brown's Vending is very receptive to the suggestion of trying some new more wholesome items in their machines for this week. They may also be willing to consider incorporating suggestions into their stock in the future. (Suggestion slips will be available at the machines). Also, with the goal of "heightening our awareness of the state of our bodies" during the week of February 14 to 18 there will be daily nutrition and fitness displays, a lifestyle test and noon-hour films in Mac-Corry, as well as dietetic interns on hand to answer nutrition questions you may have.

However, a significant change in our lifestyles cannot take place unless we take more control over the kids of food we eat through producing and preserving our own food; avoiding additives and chemicals in foods as well as excess salt and sugar by switching to more fresh unrefined foods. We're anxious to hear your ideas and reactions to Canada Food Week.

Housing Forum: part 1

ATTENTION - I am offering $160 to anyone who can provide information leading to the signing of a lease for a 7 or 8 person house.

Queen's University has an abundance of traditions; orientation week, oil thighs, April fool jokes, bagpipes, and one that is never mentioned in the frosh handouts, the annual off-campus housing hunt. This tradition, replete with monetary rewards to helpful students, house swapping, and various swindles by students and landlords alike, is one which new students aren't immediately aware of and old students prefer to forget (once they have found their accommodation). A handful of landlords, and even certain houses have become legendary, usually as a result of particularly sordid experiences.

As approximately 65 percent of the students at Queen's live off campus, the search for a place to rest one's weary head can be frustrating, backbiting, and unfulfilling. With 7,500 people looking for a place close to campus these results are almost inevitable. This column, the first in a series, is aimed at providing information, primarily for those living off-campus for the first time; basic statistical information obtained from various housing studies and information on landlords and their properties. An attempt will be made to put the housing situation at Queen's into some sort of perspective with regard to other universities. Outlines of students' housing experiences and problems will be presented, with the main focus being on how these problems were solved. Suggestions will be given with regard to finding accommodation and people to live with, organizing a successful household, and keeping relations with landlords at a fair and satisfactory level.

This is not an attempt to duplicate the existing services offered by the AMS and the housing office, nor to provide a forum for sensational horror stories.

Contributions, experiences and suggestions are welcome. The next column will give complete listings of the properties of the major landlords in Sydenham ward.

editorial opinion

A subservient press?

The news last week of a proposed salary for the editor of the Journal was contained in a report from AMS Vice President Paul Steep to the AMS Board of Directors. Accompanying this recommendation was an appendix in which Mr. Steep outlined "Journal-AMS relations," and stated that any salary for the Journal editor would consequently involve a "recognition of the AMS as the publisher of the Journal and a further recognition of the expanded supervisory role it would play in this situation."

"Salaries," he said, "would not provide the AMS with an excuse to meddle in the Journal's editorial affairs. However it would be necessary for the AMS to scrutinize the Journal staff to determine whether or not they were doing the work for which they are paid." The Journal staff's work, surely, is appearing bi-weekly at popular locations.

He continued, "this is no doubt going to prove distasteful to the Journal. I understand in matters as delicate as "freedom of the press" why this is likely to be so."

Before a salary can be implemented a referendum to suspend honouraria payments would have to be conducted and passed next year. May it be said in anticipation of that vote that any salary recommendation for the Journal editor would have to be emphatically rejected under the conditions outlined by Mr. Steep. By no means should the editor of the Journal be responsible to the student government.

Certainly the AMS is the publisher of the Journal. Defined as the student body, the Alma Mater Society should determine the merit of the newspaper editor. But the term AMS also finds meaning as the student government, run by people who often find their names on the editorial page.

It is wholly unacceptable to have as the editor of the Journal an employee of the AMS. One need look no further than Toronto to find a good example of what can happen under these circumstances. The editor of the Ryerson Eyeopener resigned furiously after the head of the student government cut by a third the editor's salary. The eye did not appear with as many pages as had been expected by the student publisher immediately after Christmas. Many eye staff noted the less than friendly treatment of the student politician by the newspaper and claimed the pay cut was at least partially an act of revenge.

Earlier this year we noted the unfair practice of remunerating certain members of the AMS organization while others who spent just as much time and had as many responsibilities went virtually unpaid. If, however, the price of a salary for the Journal editor involves more than money; if the cost is a biased or subservient press, it is not in the best interests of anyone.

Looking ahead to the 1980's and 1990's

by Principal R. L. Watts R. L.

Recent demographic studies of the 18-24 age group from which most full-time university students are drawn point to important implications for the development and character of Canadian universities in the two or three decades ahead. These studies indicate that the 18-24 age group in Canada will continue to rise quite rapidly until it hits a peak about 1982, then will suffer a dramatic ten year drop until it bottoms out around 1992 at a level more than 15 percent below that in the current 1976-7 session, and then will turn sharply upward again returning to the present level about 1998 and continuing upward beyond that. Equally significant, the severity of this roller coaster pattern will vary from province to province, the decline in the 1980's and early 1990's being steepest in Quebec, relatively severe in the Prairies and the Atlantic provinces, more moderate in Ontario and almost non-existent in British Columbia. Furthermore, within large provinces such as Ontario the pressure for increases during the next five years will be most severe upon the universities located in the major metropolitan centres and the declining demand during the 1980's will be felt most by the universities outside the large urban areas.

Health Sciences Complex: the last such project for a while!

The immediate problem facing universities and governments over the next five years is the dilemma between expanding capacity to handle the 1982 peak with the consequent result of being overbuilt and overstaffed for the following decade, or restricting the addition of staff and facilities during the next five years. If the latter policy is followed, it would require either limiting the enrolment of students who, if only they had been born five years earlier, might reasonably have expected to gain access to a university, or for a temporary period packing these students into overloaded facilities and thereby creating adverse conditions for learning. Because this pressure is most severe in the major metropolitan centres, the policies under active consideration in Ontario include arrangements to facilitate the mobility of students to those universities which are located outside the urban centres and which are still operating at less than full capacity, and the rental by metropolitan universities of temporary facilities or the resort to the declining demand during the 1980's will be felt most by the universities outside the large urban areas.

Looking further ahead the decline in overall enrolment in the 1980's will create two serious problems. In the many universities which find it necessary to shrink the pressure to reduce programmes and staff will be a source of stress and turmoil. Even those more fortunate universities which are able to maintain their enrolment will no longer be able to rely on expansion to provide the basics for change and improvement. If the steady state is not to become the intellectual disaster of the solid state it will be necessary to create procedures and inducements which will, without physical growth, maintain and encourage the spirit of innovation and discovery so fundamental to universities.

Looking further ahead to the 1990's we can foresee a sharp new demand for increased enrolment just at a time when large numbers of the current academic staff appointed during the 1960's will be approaching retirement age. If in that period Canada is to avoid a recurrence of the shortage of qualified professors and the stresses of frantic expansion which were experienced in our universities during the 1960's, governments will have to maintain the capacities of the universities during the 1980's in order that they may be able to respond effectively to the rising demands in the following decade.

What should all this mean for Queen's? Given the expectations of the 1980's a major expansion in the immediate future would appear to be unwise. Moreover, unlike many other universities we are already operating at full capacity in virtually all our Faculties and Schools and are located a considerable distance from the most rapidly expanding population areas. Our wisest course would appear to be to retain our settled policy of relatively steady enrolment at the current level and to concentrate upon maintaining the renowned quality of Queen's so that our reputation will enable us to continue at full capacity during the period of generally declining demand in the 1980's.

No, we love RMC

Dear Editor:

I am quite surprised at the February Journal's treatment of the weekend wrestling tournament at R.M.C. I believed that the Journal was above such base techniques as so obviously distorting facts.

To begin with, the meet was a friendly competition amongst the three institutions, little different from the times that the Queen's and R.M.C. teams have practised together. It is true that "Tom Rhind... wrestled extremely well," but the Journal failed to note that when he "continued his winning ways by easily defeating his opponent from R.M.C.," the match was merely for exhibition. The Journal neglected to mention the minor details that Rhind, weighing in at 185 pounds, outweighed his R.M.C. opponent by 35 pounds, and that, at the conclusion of the match he said, "Good match, Bruce, the best work-out I've had all year."

Is this an isolated incident or does the Journal consistently bias its articles?

Bonnie Burgher

"We're talking"-Christie

Dear Editor:

In response to Ross Brown's letter in the Feb. 4 Journal. Since the day that it was announced we would be elected by acclamation we have stressed that we will do everything in our power to get our goals and priorities across to the students. It is a major concern of ours that we do talk to students and exchange opinions on the issues that affect the university community. We can well understand Mr. Brown's concern about our policy but we think his criticism is both premature and ill-founded. As the leading paragraph of Jodi Button's article pointed out, the new executive will be submitting a series of articles on our policies for the next year. If Mr. Brown turned over the page from his letter he will have found our article on Operations policy. In this issue he will also find three articles by the new executive on both general and specific policy questions. There have been only two issues of the Journal since our acclamation was announced and we have contributed to both. Obviously the Journal cannot devote an entire issue simply to us, and therefore we will continue to submit articles on policy in future issues, as had been arranged before Mr. Brown's letter arrived.

But that is not all we have done, and are doing, to make our policy known to students. We have completed an interview with Q.T.V., and are arranging an interview with C.F.R.C. Articles have also been submitted to Golden Words and the Lictor. We have completed one round of residence tours and will continue to do them all term, and perhaps also in September. In addition, a public forum will be held in the near future which all interested students will be encouraged to attend through ads in the Journal. Students should also feel free, as Mr. Brown pointed out, to drop into the A.M.S. office if they have any questions or problems. This is not, as Mr. Brown implied, the only means by which we are making our policies known, but rather only one of several.

We agree with Mr. Brown that the executive must bring its policies to students, but that is not all that is required. The students themselves must make some small effort to become informed. If Mr. Brown can suggest any other means by which our policies can be made known his suggestions are welcome.

Yours Truly,
Hugh Christie

Learning by practice

Joni Bahro and Maureen Gallagher

This is the second of a few articles from the Nursing Science students for those of you who are wondering just what nurses are doing at Queen's.

The first year course involves both theory and application of our knowledge. It includes visits to the Homes for the Aged and the elderly in the community in order to practice our communication skills and to begin to assess the physical, mental and emotional status of people. We apply various theories of Maslow, Erikson and other psychologists in order to evaluate the patients in our charting records. Careful emphasis is placed upon the validation of verbal and nonverbal messages that we receive from patients. We also begin to notice the importance of empathy in relationships with others, and try to keep our minds constantly assessing the situation.

The nursing course itself involves three hours of lectures and approximately two hours of seminar per week. During seminars, the group discussions involve the practical application of nursing theory.

In addition to this, we take basic science courses. In microbiology we learn the characteristics of certain microorganisms, their classification, and diseases involved. In biochemistry, one half of the year is spent on basics, and then we study the more common biochemical reactions that occur in the human body. We also take Biology 101, Sociology 122 and Psych. 100. Another feature of the program is the eight week First Aid course. During May, you will find us in one of the hospitals in Kingston practicing our basic nursing skills.

Nurses participate in a wide range of social and athletic events sponsored by the nursing society and its committees, and the University as a whole. We will be sending a representative to the Canadian University Nursing Students Association conference (CUNSA) in March. We are the first nurses to purchase our own Nursing jackets, which we will be receiving soon.

Finally, we recognize the importance of interaction with other professional groups to gain more worldly knowledge. And for this reason you will often find us at MacDonald Hall, Clark Hall or Meds House.

Freedom of speech does not exist at Queen's U.

by Gerry Lewarne

Tuesday night many people witnessed a disgusting display which indicates that freedom of speech does not exist at Queen's. The majority of people in Dunning auditorium should be ashamed for not allowing Ross Sutherland the right to ask a question of Mr. Thomas Enders.

Many people do not agree with the small group of Queen's students who were concerned about Mr. Enders' involvement in Cambodia. However, that does not give anyone the right to attempt to stop a question which is embarrassing for a guest of this university.

By the same token, neither do the socialists have the right to interrupt the Ambassador while he is answering a question. If one feels that Mr. Enders has not answered a question properly then the question should be restated when the answer is finished. That is the practical application of one of our most basic freedoms; the freedom of speech.

The outrage felt by the socialists and which took the form of rude heckling is understandable. The rhetorical question shouted from the audience "What makes you better than the Nazi war criminal?" reflected the frustration felt by that small portion of the audience who believe that Mr. Enders should have a conscience. However, other than reflecting frustration the question was pointless. If someone asked you if you were a mass murderer, you probably would reply in the negative, particularly if you are a U.S. Ambassador.

However, the socialist did raise a very important matter, one which none of us really want to talk about. After WW II, Americans condemned the Nazis and made self-righteous proclamations. The main argument at Nuremberg trials was between the liberal man and autarchy. It was argued that if Germany had had a democratic government then the enormous atrocities would never have taken place. Yet clearly we were talking to a man on Tuesday night who played a large part in wiping out 600,000 Cambodians (he never did deny his part in it). At Nuremberg one of the questions the Nazis were asked most was, "How can you reconcile those actions with your self?" It was alright to ask that question 30 years ago, why is it not pertinent to ask that question now? Putting the question of freedom of speech aside, the Ambassador said two rather revealing things. Near the end of the question period, he stated that "it is not in our interest to get involved in Canadian politics." Presumably, therefore, it is in the American interest to get involved, there would be no hesitation to do so. That gives Canadians a sense of the Chilean feeling after the overthrow of the democratically elected Allende government.

The second statement was made by Mr. Enders after the question period. Someone asked him if he felt the "real politik" approach by the Americans to foreign policy in the last twenty years had not been counterproductive. Mr. Enders agreed and went on to say that the new administration was going to try using morality as a basis of foreign policy "as a laboratory experiment." That statement condemns the past twenty years of U.S. foreign policy and to be made by a major figure of those past twenty years shows that potentially a major shift in U.S. foreign policy is taking place. It's about time.

Sit down and be counted

Two Quebec M.P.'s refused to stand to "God Save the Queen" sung in tribute to Elizabeth II in Parliament last week. Although it may well be that Quebec's antipathy for the English animated this "rudeness", I say congratulations to those French Canadian M.P.'s. It's about time Canadians made clear our contempt for one of British history's most worn-out jokes. England, now competing with Italy for second poorest nation in Europe lavishes riches on its craven figurehead whilst the common man struggles to put meat on his table. The monarchy, once a viable form of government in Great Britain, has become an enormously extravagant mascot. Even if Buckingham palace has utility as some sort of self-deceptive illusion of prosperity, the cost of keeping it "in the style" to which it has become accustomed is a price Britain can ill afford.

One friend argued that the role of the monarchy in England has nothing to do with standing to "God save the Queen" in Canada's parliament - this was merely a matter of courtesy. Would you not, said she, stand to the American National Anthem on the fourth of July out of courtesy? I ask you, would you have stood to the German National Anthem in 1939? For that matter would you stand to South Africa's National Anthem today?

Furthermore, the vote to continue the experiment was carried out not by the residents as was implied by Miss Nicholson's article, but in fact by the Central Committee; a committee of twelve representative house members.

Thank you from Red Cross

Dear Editor:
We would like to express our thanks for the Red Cross Blood Donor Clinic on February 2nd.

The clinic operated from noon until 4pm only and in that short period, 372 donors registered and 346 units of blood were received. This was an excellent clinic and we would like to express our deep appreciation to everyone who gave blood and assisted us.

We can best sum it up by saying, "Hey, Queen's You're Terrific".

'Richler review in poor taste'

Dear Editor,
In response to Mr. Listiak's sociological sabotage concerning Mordecai Richler, which appeared in the Feb. 1 issue, I would like to remark that:

1. I found Richler's talk human, reasonably entertaining, (I wasn't expecting a comedian-you, Mr. Listiak, apparently were), and reassuringly non-prescriptive. (I wasn't expecting "4 Steps to Becoming a Great Canadian Writer"-again, I think you were disappointed on this count.)

2. I find it curious that you attack Richler largely on the basis of two articles-one concerned with politics, the other with sports. These areas are presumably ones where freedom of speech is still allowed? You attack Richler on the basis of his political opinions. You then say the articles are badly written (i.e. "garbage"). These are 2 different, incomparable, areas of discussion. I was unable to locate "Home Lights" in Douglas, but I found "Pucksure" a funny, knowledgeable, (although admittedly not technical), look at 2 Canada Cups from the point of view of a non-sportscaster who obviously cares a lot about the quality of hockey in Canada, and elsewhere!

3. As to the whole Canada-Nationalism "issue"-Mr. Richler has contributed to the Canadian identity many times by his portrayals of people and things uniquely Canadian. Perhaps, in this way, he has contributed more to Canada by leaving and returning with widened perspectives than some authors who have spent their whole lives here.

Richler said that in order to write, he felt a need to "return to his roots." As for living in London, perhaps I am overly liberal, but I feel people should live where they choose! Margaret Laurence, another author who contributes uniquely, and with excellence, to a Canadian genre in literature, has also spent extended periods of time in England and abroad elsewhere-are you prepared to revoke her citizenship also?

In your article, you displayed a level of resentment, arrogance, and poor taste that would really be a challenge to match!

Maureen Piercy

'What about student policies?'

Dear Editor:

I am writing in response to your front page story on Andre Gunder-Frank's exclusion from Canada. I would like to know why the Journal does not consider student actions and policies worth reporting. Why did the article detail the positions of everyone, except students, on these questions? Why did you not report the unanimous motion passed by the AMS, to write letters of protest to the government and the news media? What influence could that motion, which encouraged the administration to pursue this manner as strongly as possible, have, if it is not reported by the campus press? Why did you note the letter being sent to Trudeau by faculty, and ignore the petition-letter campaigning initiated by both graduate and undergraduate students? It is little wonder students often feel and are demoralized and ineffective, when our own media does not consider our actions worth reporting.

'Compelled' to defend Greer

Dear Editor:

I felt compelled to reply 'critically' to Professor Fox's article "What Has Greer Left Us With" because I am one of the "middle class university students excused for my proneness to accept Greer's generalizations uncritically" who was sitting in the audience on the evening of her lecture. Many of Professor Fox's impressions about Greer's 'hang ups' seem to be based upon his own; therefore, there were a few points which he didn't get quite right.

First of all, Professor Fox's statement that the gist of Greer's lecture was that "women should stop making their bodies 'available' to men" implies falsely that she meant for women to make themselves completely 'unavailable' to men. Rather, she suggested that women should reflect upon how "accessible" they have been making themselves, and if this was a desired position in which to be.

Secondly, he has indeed "implied" that Greer means for women to "call the tune from now on." If she had meant this, perhaps she could have been called 'hung up', but, if one remembers, Greer said she "didn't care" about the sexuality, needs and motivation of males - possibly because women may have unconsciously been trying to understand and satisfy male sexual needs under the guise of their own all along.

Greer does not propose childish, destructive (to the cause of feminism) tactics aimed against men, i.e. "trying to make men pay for what they have done to women." Rather, she seems to be more concerned with a woman's self-image; this should be clear by her poignant plea for women to "cherish" themselves. This idea, if pondered on is "very liberating" and (to be poetic) "opens up hitherto undreamed vistas of freedom."

Thirdly, Professor Fox questions "whether Greer has anything left to say in these 'rapidly changing' times". Perhaps he, as an academic, has heard it all before and has already incorporated many of Greer's then revolutionary ideas into his common way of thinking, but think of all the "non-middle-class-university-students", much less professors, who have never heard of Germaine Greer, or equate feminism with clichés such as "bra-burning" and "giving up having the door opened for you." With such a strong social norm as the traditional role of women (a role conceptualized by men), I think the phrase "molasses-like" rather than "rapidly" changing times is more appropriate.

Fourthly, Greer didn't say that "penile-vaginal contact was 'weird'". In fact, she acknowledged it as quite common - so common it was difficult to understand why. Rather, she was asking women to consider whether or not it was the best means of achieving orgasm - the generally accepted objective of the act of sexual intercourse.

Fifthly, he states that Greer did not mention vasectomy or mini-tubal ligation as alternative contraceptive methods. In fact, she did mention such methods of sterilization but didn't classify them as directly parallel to other 'temporary' methods. She urged people, before making such a decision about sterilization, to carefully consider whether or not they, themselves - not their spouses or anybody else, no longer wanted to give birth to, or father a(nother) child.

In conclusion, I believe that Professor Fox mistook Ms Greer's stance as being anti-man, rather than pro-woman - a common, but unfortunate mistake.

Laura Leavens

P.S. I believe the phrase was "cock-crinkling", not "winkling"-a much more descriptive and alliterative phrase.

Feels staffer took Greer's words out of context

Dear Editor:

I am writing in response to Denis Champagne's review of Dr. Germaine Greer's lecture which appeared on the front page of last Friday's Journal. I feel that by taking her words out of context, and tying them together with thoughts of his own, Mr. Champagne has succeeded in thoroughly mis-representing Ms. Greer.

Ms. Greer was not advocating abstinence from sex as Mr. Champagne would have us believe. Rather, a main point of her lecture, (and one that was barely touched upon in Mr. Champagne's article) was that there are many forms of sexual activity which involve other parts of the body than just the genitals. If orgasm is the main goal of sexual activity (and Ms. Greer by no means suggested that it was) there are other forms of sex which are much more likely to result in orgasm, and much less likely to result in pregnancy.

I think that Mr. Champagne also missed Dr. Greer's point on the question of abortion. Though Ms. Greer did not want to advocate abortion, she wanted women to consider whether it was any more wrong than the daily damage they could be doing to their own bodies through the use of contraceptives. She also pointed out that such forms of contraception as the I.U.D. are actually abortive agents, because they function by preventing the already fertilized ovum for implanting in the uterine wall.

Mr. Champagne quotes Dr. Greer as stating that the creation of more suitable methods of contraception would be "child's play" in this age of advanced technology. He makes Ms. Greer sound like something of a dreamer by neglecting to include in his article the basis on which she made this statement, the fact that in France they already have a diaphragm which dissolves within the body.

Though I think that Mr. Champagne missed the point of a good deal of what Dr. Greer was trying to say, most of his article is tolerable. However, at the end of the article he goes too far. When asked about love, Ms. Greer replied that the topic of her discussion was not love, but fertility, and that she did not consider that the two were necessarily related. However, Mr. Champagne conveniently omits all this and picks out one sentence which makes it sound as though Ms. Greer believed that love and fertility could not possibly be related. And then, in the exact same paragraph, Mr. Champagne throws in the line about, "I don't have much concern for the feelings of men anymore." This statement occurred much earlier in the lecture, and Mr. Champagne has taken it completely out of context. If he had bothered to listen to the rest of the lecture, he would have had ample evidence that Ms. Greer did, in fact, care very much for the feelings of men. To illustrate, she spoke about how men as well as women control their own fertility, and about how said it was for both sexes that sexual intercourse had degenerated into simple intromission.

In conclusion, I was more than a little disturbed by Mr. Champagne's article. Anyone who did not attend the lecture would get a very mistaken impression of Dr. Greer by reading his account. Though the words may have been Ms. Greer's, the intention clearly was not.

Witchcraft

religion garbed in superstition

The Sabbatic Goat

by Sheenagh Murphy

Colin Wilson in The Occult: A History, said, "The word 'witches' arouses visions of women on broomsticks, stirring cauldrons with toads and henbane, or offering obscene homage to the devil."

This is a traditional view, one which is held even today by supposedly liberated people. It is both erroneous and detrimental in its conclusions. Today witchcraft is becoming an increasingly popular and acceptable form of worship. Witches are beginning to be accepted as people with a sincere and honest belief in their religion, with as much if not greater basis, to support their views. Witchcraft is not a new concept. It has existed since the dawn of mankind, when man first attempted to control nature to ensure and aid his own survival.

At the time of the witch persecutions of the 16th and 17th centuries, witchcraft had outgrown its association with sorcery, though this was still used to calm public dissent. Witches were primarily punished for entering into a pact with the devil to deny the Christian god.

The Medieval Period, the so-called Dark Ages was relatively free of witch persecution. In the Middle Ages, the condition was more or less stable; in the 16th and 17th centuries ideas were fermenting and the established social order felt a greater need to maintain itself against potential overthrow. The terror occasioned by the executors of the Inquisition was an attempt to inspire conformity in the population.

With the gradual dissolution of feudalism and the onset of capitalism, witchcraft mania reached a peak. After the Protestant Reformation, England, under Elizabeth was the scene of a severe rash of persecutions, followed shortly by persecution under the Commonwealth.

Taboos Still Exist

The advent of witchcraft in our society is a process which has been taking place for some time. Today the old beliefs and taboos still exist, even if in a somewhat less obvious manner. The North American person is literally breast fed on prevalent Judeo-Christian ideals. It is not surprising therefore, that certain prejudices exist even now. The time has come to replace with facts what witchcraft, the religion, actually entails.

"Closely associated with nature, witchcraft can be classified as a religion or fertility. The belief is polytheistic in origin possessing two major deities. Habondia is female and her horned consort is Cerennos, also known as The Lord of Misrule or the Goat of Mendes.

The rituals involved in the invocation of these deities are also of dissimilar nature. Those concerning Habondia are usually drawn out over a more extensive period while Cerennos is invoked in a more active and animate manner.

Witchcraft emphasizes the fact that no barriers are drawn between what consists of good and/or evil. There are no barriers due to the fervent belief that these classifications do not exist above and beyond man-made mores. The two deities, Habondia and Cerennos are not, and should not be labelled as either bad or good, they are two supreme forces, whose respective characters form a yin-yang type of liaison. They possess an equal amount of power, differing in certain respects concerning what aspects of the world they control.

The symbolism involved in any ritual, whether for these specific deities or for forces of another aspect, are intricate and deeply symbolic to the witch. The traditional witchcraft group believes that the symbol used, originated from a people whose sensitivities were superior to those that modern man utilizes.

Intensive Training

Learning this symbolism is a small part in the extensive and regular training of a potential initiate. Known as a neophyte, the would-be initiate has to enter a long period of intensive preparatory training, prior to actually entering a practicing coven. This training is supplied by a member of the coven who possesses a status of a reasonably advanced level within the coven.

Once within the coven, the adept can then, through further study, achieve a higher degree of arcane knowledge. The ranks range from the neophyte, as the lowest, up to the magistallus as the highest. The powers with which these people deal are of a strong and potentially dangerous kind, the adept that attempts invocations beyond his capabilities is courting danger.

The actual rites involved include a variety of subjects from the purification of the instruments on up to invocations which can be accomplished by master adepts, shape-changing and the higher black arts. It must be emphasized that "black" is being used in context with those rituals above and beyond the reign of nature, and not in the Judeo-Christian sense of good or evil.

The coven itself consists of a number of people, maximum 13, whose ultimate goal is total self-purification. The involvement with this religion requires the total immersion of the initiate. An intense concentration is required for any ritual, usually with a lengthy and rigorous preparatory stage. Without the total amalgamation of their individual selves into what they are doing, potential dangers can occur. Meetings, or Grand Sabbaths are held on the traditional holidays such as All Hallows Eve. The individual coven meets otherwise in what is called an esphat. The time of the full moon is a popular one, though meetings can be called by the high priest or priestess at any time. Traditionally an attempt is made to have certain clauses filled concerning the actual place of the meeting.

Two Groups

Witchcraft contains, at this point in time, two noteworthy groups, The Alexandrians and the Gardinians.

For the Alexandrians, rituals are consummated in the exact same manner and using the exact instruments used centuries ago. The initiates of this religion practice in full traditional clothing. These consist of several articles. Each person dons a black cassock with bell sleeves and a cowl which can be pulled forward to cover the face. Around the waist is tied a cigillum

(a cord) upon which are the symbolic knots. A neophyte wears a tan cord, an adept a red one, the high priestess dons a white or silver cord, and the magistar a gold. In addition to this most adepts or higher levels of learning also wear a tabbard, a long rectangular piece of material which rests on the shoulders and denotes special functions or knowledge. Capes are worn by both the high priestess and the magistar, white for the former, black with red lining for the latter.

This rather cumbersome and traditional way of dressing is in direct contrast to the practice of the Gardinians, whose meetings are conducted in the nude. This is done due to the belief that clothing gathers the forces which they wish to invoke.

The Gardinians are a sect whose views and practices deviate from the true historical method. They tend to be milder in their practices, both in the actual ritual and the instruments used.

Whatever the manner in which they practice, witches hold one thing in common: That is the basic desire to strive towards self-purification. With the achievement of this, the witch has attained his goal, he becomes one with the gods. His earthly trials and tribulations will be over, and he will dwell as part of the gods he has served so well.

The Witch at Endor

Kent State

revisited

by Daniel W. Lindley

Kent State, 1977. Forty demonstrators, mostly members of the campus Revolutionary Student Brigade, are picketing outside the offices of the school paper, protesting an editorial which has condoned the execution of convicted murderer Gary Gilmore.

Jeannine Gutterman, editor of the Daily Kent Stater, staunchly surveys her opponents.

"Those people outside will picket anything that's picketable," she observes wearily.

"We're just going to let them picket. The weekend's coming up, and they'll be gone by Monday."

Nearly seven years ago at Kent State, May, 1970, a series of increasingly frustrated anti-war demonstrations which had included numerous injuries, tear-gassings, and the burning of an ROTC building, culminated in a bloody battle between students and the Ohio National Guard, which left four students dead and nine wounded. Now, while parents of the slain and wounded are appealing an August, 1975 court decision which absolved Ohio Gov. James A. Rhodes, former university president Robert I. White, and 27 National Guardsmen of guilt in the shootings, the campus has changed; but May 4 is remembered.

Even as observers see the majority of students becoming politically apathetic and returning to their books in preparation for careers, the May 4 Task Force continues to stage a 24-hour vigil each year on the anniversary of the killings.

"The last noisy rally we had was three years ago when Jane Fonda spoke," says Bob Hart, chairman of the organization. Last May 4, though the university administration refused to suspend classes for the day, over half of the 18,000 students boycotted school and a few thousand marched through the town of Kent and back to the commons where the shootings occurred.

"It was very peaceful, very quiet, really eerie," observes the editor of the Kent Stater.

A lieutenant from the local police department attributes the lack of violence subsequent to the shootings to the excellent organization of the Task Force. Students at Kent State these days, he feels, are less radical and are "resorting to conventional means of change." The average Kent State is no more rowdy than the average member of the surrounding populace, drug intake remains about the same as in 1970, and the campus is quiet and "operating as normally as other American universities," he reckons.

There has been a degree of student concern voiced over two recent developments. Author Peter Davies, who wrote The Truth About Kent State, and Robby Stamp, one of the May 4 wounded, have both donated their papers that deal with the day's events to the Yale library rather than to Kent State. In a second development, the administration plans to begin construction this spring of a gymnasium which will cover part of the field where the killings took place.

Davies and Stamp gave their papers and artifacts (Stamp's bundle includes a pair of pants with a bullet hole in one leg) to Yale because they said Kent State librarians would not agree to keep the documents from government agencies. Davies said that Yale provided "instant information, security, forms, and applications and procedures showing how people would have access."

Though some students claim that Kent State administrators did not even want the papers because they are obsessed with down-playing the brutal episode, which apparently has had an adverse effect on enrollment, the Kent State archivist says that "we try to collect everything we can on the event that is significant." The archivist negotiated with Davies for eight months, and then left it to Davies to call him back. Two years later, the papers went to Yale.

Tony May, who handles Kent State's public relations, says that he "was not aware of the librarians' and archivist's activities. Neither was anyone else here on the executive level. We can't help it if our archivist does not have an aggressive personality."

The gymnasium, he continues, will cover only a fraction of the one-time football field where the students were shot. Though around 75 students appeared at a trustees' meeting to protest the building, ground for the edifice will be broken this spring, says May.

Still, student leaders appear to be upset, and a petition drive is underway to halt construction; however, few seem to believe that the petition will have any effect.

"It's hard to tell what they (the students) are interested in," the Task Force chairman muses. "They don't seem to care much about national politics or even about campus issues such as tuition hikes."

"Everything's changed," the editor of the local paper in Kent concurs. "We see a revival of the Greek atmosphere, with fraternities and sororities. The memory of May 4 is still alive amongst the townspeople, and there still are some who make sure we don't forget. Though they'll never forget the shock of martial law, more people are venturing on to the campus for cultural events."

Meanwhile, the Task Force goes to classes and talks with people who for the most part were in junior high during 1970. Though the speakers attending the annual May 4 vigil may be fewer and may talk more softly, Bob Hart believes that the event might become a tradition.

"People may have been on different sides of the issue politically, but morally they agree."

Guards proceed towards students behind tear gas.

Students scurry for cover in the parking lot during the shooting.

After the shooting students aid one of the wounded while guardsmen look on.

Queen's Choral Ensemble gets

Standing O in Guelph

by Cathy Fuyarchuk
 Queen's Choral Ensemble spent the past weekend singing their hearts out in Guelph and London (although the bus ride home was something else again). Saturday evening the senior group put on a repeat performance of their January 29 concert in Grant Hall at a concert sponsored by the University of Guelph Choir. Mozart's Coronation Mass, Purcell's Rejoice in the Lord Alway and Norman Luboff's African Mass were among the works performed; the ensemble was given a standing ovation, which did much to relinquish fears that certain... er... independent trends, shall we say, in the Mozart were bound to be noticed.

Sunday morning the group left Guelph for the University of Western Ontario where they performed at the Inter Varsity Choral Festival along with choirs from Western, Waterloo and Toronto; this was the first year the Queen's has participated in the event and they weren't half bad at that. They sang Healey Willan's Gloria Deo and their African Mass (to the percussion accompaniment provided by Trevor and Tim Houle, Pam Cleaver, Dale Mieske and Pete Tomblin) much to the delight of the audience, who couldn't help but get caught up in the rhythmic vitality and enthusiasm of the Queen's Ensemble. Waterloo in particular appeared rather musty in comparison. And Western - well, nothing is funnier than watching a university choir with as strong a male section as has Western, putting everything they've got into "Wee Willie Winkie" and other such ditties; there seemed to be a lot of potential there, but even their treatment of negro spirituals lacked any sensitive interpretation. Hart House Chorus from U of T, which shares own own conductor, Professor Denise Narcisse-Mair, put on a tremendous show with some really fine solo performances; their handling of Derek Healey's There is One Body was far-out, to say the least.

The weekend's tour went very smoothly, much to the credit of the Guelph Choir and to Murray Pengelly, Queen's tour manager. Upcoming events include a return visit to Queen's March 19 by the University of Guelph Choir. On March 6 the Choral Ensemble will be singing at the Baccalaureate Ceremony in Grant Hall and in May a trip to Washington, D.C. is planned as a grand finale to their season - so, if you haven't bought your grapefruits and oranges yet, contact a member of the Choral Ensemble, the money raised from this citrus fruit sale is going towards deterring costs from the Washington tour.

Amazing Jane Coop

Born in Saint John, New Brunswick, Jane Coop studied with the late Dr. Gladys Egbert in Calgary, and then with Anton Kwerit at the University of Toronto, from which she graduated in 1972, winning the W.O. Forsyth Memorial Scholarship for highest proficiency in piano. She worked with Peter Feuchtwanger in London, and in 1973-4 attended the Peabody Conservatory with Leon Fleisher, receiving a Master of Music degree from that institution.

She won First Prize in the CBC Talent Festival in 1970, and in 1972 won prizes in the Canadian Music Competition and the Maryland International Piano Competition.

Jane Coop has performed with leading orchestras in Canada including the Toronto Symphony, the National Arts Centre Orchestra, the CBC Vancouver Chamber Orchestra, as well as having given recitals throughout Canada and the U.S.A.

Bitter Grounds, Saturday...

Cape Breton Cameron

It is not inconceivable that a Bob Dylan could have been born in any big U.S. city. And it would be easy to believe that a Frank Sinatra came from Hoboken, N.J. or Gary, Indiana. But when it comes to the origins of John Allan Cameron, it becomes obvious that only one place in North America could have produced such an individual talent. And that place is, of course, the Highlands of Cape Breton in the Maritimes.

Cameron started at a very young age, playing the twelve-string guitar at local maritime concerts. Later, while studying at St. Francis Xavier University, coffee houses became his vehicle for musical and artistic development. Since then, he has played at the Grand Ole Opry in Nashville, and in such diverse geographic locations as Osaka, Japan and High Park in Toronto. He hosted his own national television series on the CTV network during the 1975-76 season.

He sings, with a deep respect, the music that has come from the people; and he tells stories, both serious and hilariously funny.

John Allan Cameron, the man who has been called "Canada's first authentic soul singer", will be appearing this Saturday (tomorrow) at Bitter Grounds. Admission is $2.25 with membership, $2.75 without.

Film Reviews

Truffaut's "Adele H." and:

by Glenn Stairs

I watched the first half of Adele H. like an idiot, waiting for the Good Part. The Good Part, which never came, could have been a piece of flashy camera technique; a powerful bit of acting; some meaningful, eloquent lines; or (let's be honest) a glimpse of Isabelle Adjani in her petticoat.

After realizing that the Good Part just wasn't coming, I began to wonder why anyone would bother to make a film without one. The film seemed flat, prosy, even depressing. Depressing! The Critic . . . depressed? I suddenly realized I was trapped in a state of sweaty emotional involvement. Fellini, forgive me: Truffaut had very subtly drawn the Critic into an active feeling of pity for the heroine.

The plot of the film is a simple one, certainly not sufficient in itself to dupe a seasoned Critic. Adele Hugo (daughter of Victor) has followed a British army lieutenant to Halifax, where she attempts to bribe him into marriage. Of course, he rejects her proposal, and the rest of the film is concerned with her psychological deterioration. A sad but true story, folks - based on Adele Hugo's journal, which is now available in Harlequin paperback.

Isabelle Adjani (as Adele) is largely responsible for rescuing the film from the "quagmire of mediocrity". Truffaut, and the role itself, demand a performance which would tax the most experienced and sensitive actress; and Adjani responds with no small degree of finesse. The film centres so definitely on Adele that Adjani's success determines the success of the film itself.

The camera technique of the film is deceptively simple. Adele is seldom off camera; the frame centres on her, rarely including more than two other characters; and a surprising number of shots are close middle (bust) shots. This technique helps depress Critics: we are forced to watch Adele in misery. I found myself wishing the camera would zoom out to let me look at the settings.

The settings themselves would hardly offer any relief. Dull browns and cold greys dominate the film, and most settings are very dimly lit. Darkness almost becomes a motif in the film: Adele's face is often framed in it; many scenes actually fade to a black frame.

Truffaut is one of very few directors who can make effective use of incidental music, applying it frugally and thoughtfully. Two musical themes appear in the film: one, a harsh, terrifying chug, runs under nightmare scenes, and the other, a sombre string waltz, helps out on meaningful closeups and climactic moments.

Why all the attention to exciting emotion? The film is intended as a critical examination of both the romantic impulse and the need for identity. Ahem. These two drives express themselves in a conflict within our heroine's mind. The romantic impulse wins out and is ultimately responsible for the loss of identity and sanity. Truffaut assumes that both are emotional experiences (how true) and must be expressed emotionally in order to be understood. At least that makes me feel better about my sweaty emotional involvement.

Streisand's rock "Star"

By Dan Fruhling

There has been a wealth of negative criticism about Barbra Streisand's remake of the film A Star Is Born, and Barbra is no stranger to it. She is a woman of extraordinary artistic talent and determination but her many critics refuse to believe she ever gives enough, and her work in A Star Is Born is no exception.

Ms. Streisand has completely immersed herself in every aspect of production, and her superhuman efforts have yielded an enjoyable, interesting, slightly narcissistic movie. Besides starring, she was the executive producer, the author of many of the movie's songs, many times the editor, other times director, also co-ordinator, and if she could have, she would have written the reviews, with the same intensity she put in the making of the picture.

The movie is a modern love story set in the high powered risky world of rock music. Barbra Streisand plays Esther Hoffman a young and on the rise young singer and Kris Kristoferson is John Norman Howard a deteriorating superstar. As his career plummets to a boozy hell, her career rockets her into instant superstardom. His failure, and her consuming success finally drive him to suicide. This simple, sometimes touching love story is just a pretext to see Barbra in concert and the story is just pretty lace surrounding her music.

However, both the pretty lace story and Barbra's music are very pleasing, at times dazzling, and Ms. Streisand deserves all the credit for the success of the picture. That the music is not hard, pulsating and infernally loud rock is hardly of any importance and, in fact, aids the movie in reaching a wider, and perhaps more mature audience. The songs written by (again) Ms. Streisand along with other notable talents, the likes of: Paul Williams, Leon Russell, Kenny Loggins, Kenny Asher and Rupert Holmes are powerfully and beautifully sung by Barbra's outstanding voice.

There is no doubt that the movie is a self testimonial to Barbra, but she alone has given birth to it, and it has turned out to be a different and handsome product. For Streisand fans, Barbra is back full of beautiful song and superior acting, and the movie is a true vehicle for all her talents.

Larry Coryell.

Apocalyptic Revelation Revisited

I find it rather interesting the way some critics can generalize various movements in music by the decade. For example, many critics have labelled the 60's as the period of tremendous upheaval for many kinds of music - rock, jazz, fusion - and the 70's as the cooler shadow that naturally follows these creations. In this case, the media's exploitation of rock music caused a movement towards the parameterless electric sound, which overtook the 50's popular acoustic vibrations in the music market. It was also during the 60's that fusion music (jazz-rock, NOT to be confused with funk-rock or as it has been commercialized, disco music, became a part of the electric movement, substantiated by the works of such notables as Miles, John McLaughlin, and Billy Cobham. However, by the late 60's most people seemed to be into the 'heavy' rock sound and the conversation-distorting volume that became associated with it.

It was during this period that a number of critics started labelling a young Texas born guitarist, Larry Coryell, as the fastest around New York. Of course, there was major competition at the polls, in record sales and in overall musical success, from the energy-emphatic John McLaughlin. However, their individual styles were noticeably different: Coryell exhibited a somewhat more sophisticated approach to phrasing and an incredibly fast, sweeping expression within intervals.

Larry Coryell began playing the piano back in 1947 at age 4; however, it wasn't until 1950 that a steady interest in music was revealed. The first hollow-bodied string instrument he had in his lap was a toy ukelele, at 12. He then progressed to a crude cowboy guitar, from which the step to the electric was small. Coryell attended the University of Washington at Seattle,

Record Review

Abba's Greatest Hits

by Bob Murphy

Abba is two girls and two guys from Sweden, whose claim to fame is a completely unassuming and unpretentious brand of pop (bubblegum is you will) music which has gained them immense popularity in Europe, and an impressive string of his singles on this side of the Atlantic.

In light of their limited popularity, to this point, in North America, a Greatest Hits LP may seem a bit premature. Indeed, at my count, only about half of the numbers included here have found their way over local airwaves with any regularity. Too, these make up, in my opinion, the better half of the collection. I can only guess that the North American reaction to these releases has prompted Atlantic (the group's American distributor) to assume that a similar demand for Abba will arise on these shores. And, they may be quite right.

Granted, the music and lyrics are strictly lightweight, directed primarily at the large pre-pubescent portion of the record buying market. Still, it is refreshingly sophisticated bubblegum, and very likeable.

While the band has been around only since 1973, a listen to their first single, "Waterloo", makes it obvious that they were no strangers to the music business prior to that time. The sheer number of hooks which producers Benny Andersson and Bjorn Ulvaeus manage to work into each song attests to their thorough understanding of the pop idiom. Melodic hooks abound, be they instrumental or vocal - a simple case of "if thy can't get you one way, they'll get you another."

The overall production, too, is pleasant - bright, crisp, never overbearing and establishes that Andersson and Ulvaeus have passed their apprenticeships in the studio. In fact, nine times out of ten it is the production which pulls the tracks over the top, allowing them to stand out over the usual AM fare.

Excellent musicianship (in particular some tasty keyboards), and strong infectious melodies are other features commending Abba's music. Vocally they evoke everyone, from the Beach Boys, and Sparks, to Alvin and the Chipmunks - sometimes within the same song.

"SOS" and "Waterloo" represent the high points here, with the rest of the songs varying from first-rate pop tunes to banal bubblegum.

While Abba is certainly not everyone's cup of tea, anyone who can be grabbed by a catchy tune is likely to find a good part of this record irresistible. And, that's nothing to scoff at. A good many of the 'heavier' bands around would benefit greatly from a listen to Abba's Greatest Hits. It would serve as a valuable lesson in melody to all those who think, wrongly, that it is necessary to steer clear of such popular concessions in their music, or be forever labelled a commercial band.

Apocalyptic Vision Revisited

however, playing the guitar and listening to the more prominent jazz guitarists of the time - Barry Kessel, Les Paul, Wes Montgomery, Joe Pass, and Charlie Christian.

It was at this time that Coryell experienced his first 'apocalyptic revelation'; his realization that the whole THING of music out there; from which point motivation to listen, see, compose, and play took over.

Another part of his 'apocalyptic revelation' was the aura of life style surrounding the music and what it could teach. Thus, he was led closer to the roots of jazz: "if you start off listening to Miles and Trane and then follow the personnel, you get to everyone." After leaving college, he got a job in Seattle with some older musicians where he learned more about accompaniment and backing chords. Soon after, the jazz magnet drew him to New York where he eventually formed a band with saxophonist Steve Marcus (1966) called the Free Spirits. Soon after he was credited with his first recording a la Chico Hamilton, from which a fortunate opportunity to play with vibist Gary Burton and his group occupied most of his time. In '68 he left Burton, feeling far more professional and confident as a leader, performer, and about the music he was able to communicate.

Up to this point in his career, Coryell was playing more of an accompaniment form of electric guitar, at a volume level that contributed to the music, rather than dominating it.

Coryell's explanation of this switch from jazz towards the rock spectrum goes back to his early teens when he was exposed to a fair amount of rock music. As he considered rock quite simple, he became interested in jazz, something he found more complex and diverse. However, first impressions are lasting; and the rock sound became a part of his personality. By '68, he regarded the rock music as the more complex. Therefore, he decided to investigate this part of his personality and explore its potential.

Undoubtedly, another powerful motivator swaying Coryell towards the rock scene was the power of the music market at that time - rock album sales were booming, while jazz artists, although confident about the content of their creations, knew that the music they were playing and composing wouldn't sell or capture a large enough record market share.

In early '73, Coryell realized the necessity for a change, and the formation of his group, the Eleventh House later that year, provided an exit from his past series of search parties and sloppy lifestyle. The fusion music that resulted was more rock-orientated than the jazz sounds being produced by Chic Corea and Return to Forever, another popular fusion group at the time.

His movement towards the acoustic vibrations started in later '74 through his work with Steve Kahn, Ralph Towner, Collin Walcott, and Glen Moore. An album they produced (excluding Kahn) entitled the Restful Mind, typifies the paradox Coryell was experiencing at the time between the electric and acoustic sound. His subsequent two albums also illustrate this split image, as both contain electric and acoustic compositions. Though it appeared Coryell was selling out again, this time, in a gradual process of uncertainty he was moving away from the electric sound, and back towards jazz-oriented, softer, "quieter and beautiful music". As he puts it, "I wish we (the Eleventh House) could learn to get really quiet with our electric instruments. There seems to be a certain level of volume that you can't go beneath, and that bugs me."

The first indication I had regarding Coryell's total devotion towards this direction was during August of '76 after hearing about a solo concert he had presented the night before I arrived in Vancouver. Interestingly enough, the audience's reaction to his new image paralleled that which prevailed in Toronto last week when he projected a similar style, playing solo. His act consists of both acoustic and electric guitars, the latter apparently being what the audience came expecting to see. Their jubilant reaction at the point where Coryell picks up the electric instrument, and the low-keyed murmurs that one is surrounded by when he puts it back down to retrieve his restringing acoustic model seem to indicate that the audience came to see the Eleventh House sound, and not soft, classical-jazz guitar work offered.

"The Lion and the Ram", Coryell's recent release, is also a contrast to the amperage-orientated sound of the Eleventh House. Michael Urbaniak adds some violin on the title cut, and Danny Toan some extra guitar on another cut. The overall force is encompassed to a greater extent within the music, rather than behind it in the form of amps. The guitar work is as fast and accurate as ever, with the accompanying musicians providing a tight support for the intricate riffs Coryell flows in and out of the music. This album is a new concept for acoustic and soft electric guitar work.

A final point worth mentioning is that Coryell is very much aware of the barriers that exist when producing an album that doesn't compliment current popular styles. But, let's hope he doesn't have an agreement with Arista that goes to the tune, "I get to produce an album the way I want for every album I produce the way you want."

As unrealistic as it sounds, one can't help but wonder from listening to Coryell's past three albums whether the style variation is a result of his coming out, or money going in, the record company's bank account.

Volleyball Men: a close third in eastern Ontario

by Dave Tod

Last weekend the Queen's Men's Volleyball team travelled to Toronto to round out the league schedule. This was their second trip in two weeks, previously defeating York and R.M.C. (at York) handily the weekend of Jan. 22. As a result of this inspiring victory the Gaels entered last week's tourney hoping they could make the O.U.A.A. finals. Due to their mediocre performance in the first half of the year the team had its work cut out for it.

An early morning win by University of Toronto over Laurentian placed Queen's in a precarious position. This meant that Queen's had to defeat all teams without losing a single game. In the first match of the day the Gaels were pitted against our arch rivals U. of T. The Varsity Blues' squad fresh from a victory over the previously undefeated Laurentian Voyageurs were ready to take on all comers. However, appropriate physical and mental preparation by Coach Dale Huddleston enabled our Gaels to humiliate their stunned opponents, 15-12, 15-8, 15-4. In the second match Queen's steamrolled Ryerson 15-8, 15-5, 15-3. The final match determined the eastern Ontario representatives to the O.U.A.A. finals. Queen's had to defeat Laurentian three games straight. In a tense and hard fought confrontation the Gaels were edged 15-13. Even though their hopes for a provincial championship were now gone, Queen's battled back to take the second game 15-8. The mentally drained Gaels finished third in the tournament behind Laurentian and York but it should be noted that Queen's had the best record of any university team in the second half of the season. On the whole the Gaels placed third in eastern Ontario, one match behind a two way tie for first place between Laurentian and York.

Fortunately all but two members of this year's team will be returning as Jim Young and Lyle Collins will graduate from McArthur College in May. The team also wished me to express their thanks to Coach Huddleston for the time he has invested over the past year and the volleyball Gaels are looking forward to next year with optimism and enthusiasm.

NOTE: All those members who have not reimbursed Dave MacDonnell for the "movies" shown in his hotel room would they contact him immediately.

Valentine's day wishes for the sporting world

by Frank Pagnucco

Valentine's Day gives us another opportunity to share our love with others. The World of Sport is teeming with individuals who need a whole lot of loving. The following list suggests a number of candidates and the merits which entitle them to a little love and understanding on that all important day.

George Chuvalo, Canadian and Commonwealth Heavyweight Boxing Champion, for being the only overweight, overaged boxer who remains champion due to lack of competition.

Dave Schultz, hockey player with the Los Angeles Kings, who changed his fighting style of hockey to affirm what we all knew before, that he didn't belong in the National Hockey League.

Howie Meeker, former N.H.L. star and presently commenting for Hockey Night in Canada, for holding the distinction of wetting his pants anytime someone scores a goal.

Eli Nastase, professional tennis star, for being the most sportsmanlike player that ever graced a tennis court.

George Knudson, Canadian golf pro, for trying, trying, trying but never, never, never winning.

The American Baseball League, for putting a new franchise in a city that has grown to appreciate losers, Toronto.

Jim Young, football player with the British Columbia Lions, for being the Queen's graduate best exemplifying the mundane tactics it takes to survive 'out there' without the benefit of a Commerce degree.

The Government of Tanzania, for demonstrating its desire to promote a good atmosphere in international relations by not allowing athletes such as Filbert Bayi to compete in international track meets such as the Telegram Meet in Toronto.

Mohammed Ali, Heavyweight

Queen's hosts the Figure skating championships this weekend. The team is strong and is favoured to win the title. Action takes place at Jock Hartley Arena on Friday evening and Saturday during the day. Come on out and cheer this highly talented group on to victory.

Women finish high in elite league

by Jill Calder

The super-successful season that the Women's Intercollegiate Volleyball team has put in is drawing to a close. This year's inexperienced team has worked hard and found themselves in contention for a championship spot. Last week-end's tournament here at Queen's proved challenging but, as the results show, the Gaels took the challenge.

League Games (best 3 of 5 games)
Queen's versus York 15-2, 15-3, 15-4

Waterloo 11-15, 11-15, 6-15.

McMaster 15-7, 6-15, 15-7, 14-16, 15-13.

Windsor 15-11, 15-10, 15-7

These league games finish up the prefinals. The standings for the elite league of Ontario (the top six universities) is:

Western	18
Waterloo	16
Queen's	12
Windsor	8

The Gaels also played an exhibition tournament on the Saturday of their busy weekend. They won all but their last match with a very experienced club team. Of the whole weekend, 16 of 23 matches that the Queen's Squad battled, were victories.

This weekend the Gaels will be playing the prefinals at Ryerson. The third to sixth place teams in the elite league will be participating along with the top two teams of the O.V.A. (the league comprised of all other universities except the top six). This year these teams have turned out to be Wilfred Laurier and Guelph. Two teams from this weekend will make it to the finals at Waterloo with first and second place Western and Waterloo.

You're at the "club-house turn" girls! Good Luck!

Cheers!

Gaels burn Blues

by Tom Shand

The Queen's Golden Gaels hockey team came up with the upset of the year in Toronto on Wednesday night with a 10-8 victory of the Blues. The win was the third in succession for the young team which has certainly come into its own despite having only a mathematical chance of making the playoffs. Not only are the Gaels a far healthier and more experienced team than they were in the early season but the youngsters have taken over the leadership of the squad and their enthusiasm has spread spontaneously throughout the ranks.

The line of Kevin Treacy, Gary Brandt, and Willie Wing fully exploited their scoring potential in Toronto notching five goals. Treacy counted the hat trick while both of his linemates had singles.

The combination of the MacIntyres, John and Ned, and Terry Angel who have been instant death to all opposition since being formed about five games ago, continued their sensational play with four goals against Blues' goaltender Mark Logan. John and Terry were the scorers with two each. The Gaels' other scorer was Dale Sandles who possesses probably the hardest shot on the team.

Blues scorers were Dan D'Alvise with three, Alex Jeans with a pair, and Rocci Pagnello, Warren Anderson, Jim Snedsinger with singles. Although Jeff Beck was scored on eight times he far outplayed his counterpart in the Toronto nets. The Blues led 2-1 after the first period, but from then on it was all Queen's as they emerged with a 7-4 lead by the end of the middle frame.

The victory improved the Gaels' record to 4-11-1 whereas the Blues are now 10-4-1. Unfortunately for the Gaels, the victory counted for only two points in the standings although the game was originally scheduled as a four pointer.

Gaels next action is at Laurentian this Saturday night at 8pm and Sunday afternoon at 2 pm. Both games can be heard live on CFRB 1490.

Knicks lack the knack

by Michael Fitzgibbon

New York Knick General Manager Eddie Donovan is a very desperate man these days. He is frantically searching for a way to absolve the team of its inability to win on the road. Donovan is asking the other 21 NBA teams for three small favors when they play host to the Knicks: permit the Knicks to wear their home white uniforms, have the public address announcer introduce the New York line-up with a Brooklyn Twang - ie "New Yawk gahd, Walt Frazah", and plead with the weatherman to predict smog and haze on gameday.

You see, the New York Knickerbockers play an entirely different game when they are in the big city. In the wild Madison Square Garden the Knicks hold an impressive 16-7 record. However on the road the team has managed to win only 7 times in 27 appearances. The concerned general manager is only trying to make the team feel more at home when they are travelling.

The Knicks are an enigma to their fans, coaches, and the other NBA teams. They have more talent than the people of Buffalo have snow shovels. The payroll is so awesome that Brinks Armored Car Service is required to haul it in on payday. Their coach, Red Holtzman ranks among the premier coaches in the game and is a genius in hoop strategy. Yet the New Yorkers are only in third place in the NBA's Atlantic Conference. They trail Dr. J and his Philadelphia Seventy-Sixers by 8 games, and their sub-par 23-27 record is indicative of their play.

The Knicks problem is an intricate one. They got a real bargain in December when they swapped John Gianelli for Buffalo's super center Bob McAdoo. New Yorkers were buzzing at the trade and began saving their money for the expensive playoff games. But the "Big Mac's" migration to southwestern New York has posed some problems for the team. Coach Holtzman has designed several plays which cater to McAdoo's shooting. New York Times sportswriter Dave Anderson believes that this strategy has backfired to a degree saying, "As a result, the guards (Walt Frazier and Earl Monroe) have been standing around rather than penetrating." "Big Mac" has filled the center slot nicely, but his 23 points-a-game average can not carry the whole team.

The guards are weary and consequently have been subject to defensive lapses. Walt Frazier, the $450,000 a year All-Star has been in a slump all season. The backcourt demon has turned the ball over frequently and has continually been beaten by quicker guards. "Clyde" Frazier is averaging about 6 assists per game, but his total point production has melted away substantially from last season. The New York press has hounded Clyde all season long for his uninspired play and their pot shots led to his dismissal as the Knicks captain last week.

Flashy Earl "the Pearl" Monroe is prancing around the court and contributing to the Knicks' offence. However he too has been inconsistent in his defensive skills. The team recently signed Dean "the Dream" Meminger to a 1½ year contract. The 6'11" guard returns to the Big Apple after a three year sabbatical. The New York management is expecting the Dream to add some punch to the Knicks scoring and provide rest for Frazier and Monroe.

Players have popped in and out of the Knick line-up as if it were Grand Central Station. Lonnie Shelton, Ticky Burden, Butch Beard, and Jim McMillan are just some of the new faces. Former Seattle Supersonics Spencer Haywood has donned the Knick jersey infrequently this season and is more accustomed to the drab hospital garb which a leg injury has forced him to wear.

The New York Knicks are still in an adjustment stage. The players are just beginning to familiarize themselves with each other. Unfortunately the playoffs are just around the bend, and a complete Knicks turnaround on the road is highly unlikely. The Knicks seemed doomed to watch the NBA playoffs on television this year. But with the inevitable maturation of the youngsters and adaptation of the players the Knicks are going to be a team to reckon with in the future. Dr. J and his Seventy-Sixers will surely get a good taste of the Knicks - "Big Mac" style.

AMS Housing Lottery

Wednesday, Feb. 16

Dorrs open 6 - 7 pm

Grant Hall

Draw at 7:15 p.m.

Rules and Procedures

1. The lottery establishes only a position on the waiting list. The number of units available of any size depends on the number of renewals. There is usually a 50 percent turnover. We will know which apartments and houses will be available on March 1, at which time you will be informed if you have a unit.
2. The lottery is open only to Queen's students who will be registered as full time students for the academic year 1977-1978. Green cards must be presented at the lottery or at the AMS office by 5pm Tues., March 1, if a place on the list is obtained. You don't have to stay for the draw, but it is up to you to find out if your name is selected. A list of those names will be posted on the bulletin board outside the AMS office.
3. Each student is entitled to only one ballot, available at the door, which can be applied to only one type of dwelling unit. If two ballots are found in the same name both will be destroyed. However, if you are applying for a five-man house, for example, all five prospective tenants may apply. Bring your own pencil to sign ballot.

4. An individual whose name is drawn and who chooses to accept the dwelling must be a tenant of the unit, and must have his name on the lease (and be legally bound by the terms of the lease.)

5. Units leased through AMS Housing based on number of single bedrooms.

Keen competition in Bews

by Mike Gouinlock

Although the ball hockey season has been plagued by cancellations and rescheduling this year, the season is almost half over. Undeclared teams include three time defending champions Arts 77 who boast a 3-0 record to lead Division No. 1, Commerce 79 (2-0) and Arts 78 (1-0) in Division No. 2, last year's runners-up Civil (2-0) in Division No. 3, and Meds (1-0), MBA (1-0-2), and Commerce 78 (1-0-1) in Division No. 4. Competition in the league this year has been much tighter than in the past with very few routs. The top five teams go as follows: No. 1 Arts 77 - they move the ball around and have an uncanny ability to hit the open man and are extremely strong in goal and on defence. They seem to have regained their old scoring touch in a 9-0 romp over second place Mechanical on Monday. Their weakness could be their inability to come from behind. No. 2 Civil - although pressed hard in their last outing, have excellent conditioning that pays off. They are probably the only team that can play a "shot it down and chase it" game. Though an extremely well-balanced team, goal could be a problem area. Penalties could determine whether Civil wins or loses a championship; No. 3 Commerce 79 - had a big early season victory over Commerce 77. They have a lot of players with good ball hockey sense. Yet they do not move the ball around enough to win a championship. No. 4 MBA - although they have tied two games, they have a few players who move the ball around well. They are big and strong and the defence makes it tough on those who stand in front of the net. However they lack the depth needed to win the championship. No. 5 Arts 78 - they won a big game over Mining on Monday and are rated No. 5 solely on the goaltending of Ross Pearson. They have only mediocre scoring power and are somewhat loose defensively, but a team will still have to score a lot to beat them.

SPORTS SHORTS...Commerce 80 upset defending champion MBA in basketball last week 38-35. MBA shot poorly from the field in the first half and fell too far behind. One observer of the game remarked that "for a young team they (Comm 80) showed a lot of maturity." Commerce 77 continues to do well in the individual sports (squash, handball, table tennis) and this could help them pressure PHE for top spot in the final standings... Bob McCormack of Meds won the individual Nordic Skiing title; Science 80 won the team championship... There was a major upset in hockey on Tuesday. Previously undefeated and defending champions Arts 77 were thrashed 5-2 by MBA who are fighting for a play-off position.

WIC News

Intramural Conference: Last weekend at the Erindale campus of the University of Toronto, three representatives from WIC attended an Intramural conference. Various universities, colleges and highschools from Ontario attended. Such topics as: motivating women's intramurals, financing intramural programs, scheduling and liability in intramurals were discussed. It was a very enjoyable weekend for all those who attended and the WIC reps came home with many interesting ideas.

Executive Nominations: Nominations for WIC executive open March 1. The positions that need to be filled are Chairman, three Publicity Officers, two Awards Officers and an Officials Officer. All the nominations must be accompanied with ten signatures and submitted to Madeline Pavelka's office, 2nd floor, PHE centre.

Convenors: Applications for convenors for the fall term of '77 are now available. Put some of your ideas into action and run your favourite sport or assist in one that you'd like to learn about. All help is welcomed. Applications can be picked up in Madeline's office.

Free Throw: WIC is introducing a new activity - a basketball free throw contest. It will be a self-run tournament from March 1-16. If interested in participating please sign the appropriate list on the bulletin board in the Women's Locker Room. All entries must be submitted by Friday Feb. 18.

Bulls-eye!

On Friday, February 4 and Saturday, February 5, the Women's O.W.I.A.A. Archery Tournament was held in the Bartlett Gym. The total scores of the four teams competing were U. of Western-5784, U. of Toronto-5553, U. of Guelph-5002 and Queen's-4975.

The individual scoring leaders were Linda Kazienko, U. of Guelph at 514 in the first round, Audrey Cass, U. of Western at 505 in the second round and Linda Kazienko again in the third round at 532.

Touche! Well, almost

The Queen's fencing team travelled to Toronto last weekend to compete in two tournaments. The first was the Far Eastern Divisional qualification tournament which was supposed to be held last week at Trent but was cancelled because of the snowstorm. The top two teams and the top six individuals from this meet then advanced to the Eastern Ontario sectionals. The top 2 teams and the top individuals from this second tournament advance to the OUA finals to be held at Carleton this weekend.

In the first of the two tournaments our foil team beat Trent 7-2, Carleton 8-1, and RMC 5-4. This placed Queen's in first place in the far east division. Individually, all three foilists made the top 6. Steve Brien placed 1st, Peter Kingman 4th and Mark Donaldson 6th.

The epee team fared very well also. Queen's lost to Trent 5-4 but came back to grab second place and advance to the eastern sectionals by beating Carleton 5-4 and RMC 6-3.

Scott Scheuermann and Steve Sorge placed 1st and 2nd in the individual competition to lead the far eastern division into the sectional meet. Scheuermann was a standout with his 23-2 record on the day stringing together 19 consecutive victories.

In the eastern sectional tournament the foil team beat RMC 5-4 but lost to both U. of T 6-3 and Ryerson 8-1 to place a disappointing 4th and were eliminated in the individual competition.

The epee team lost to U. of T 7-2. They then lost a heatbreaker to Trent 5-4 which came down to the last touch of the last bout. The loss to Trent placed Queen's in 3rd place in the eastern's and eliminated them from the OUA finals this weekend.

On the right side Scheuermann posted a 5-0 record to place first in his pool while teammate Sorge fenced to a 3-2 record to place second in the other pool. Both fencers qualified for the OUA finals this weekend at Carleton.

We wish both Scott and Steve the best of luck in their competition this weekend. Bring back the OUA individual epee crown, boys!

Gals squash opponents

After enduring mechanical failure in Toronto, McMaster Women's Squash team finally arrived here on Sunday. Mac was completing an eastern tour of Ottawa, Montreal and Kingston. In a head to head competition Mac only managed two victories. Overall, Queen's won 13 matches to 6 matches.

Queen's team consisted of Sandra Harris, Jan Longhurst in place of Jane Sawynok, Jo Ann Price, Jane Farkes-Roberts, Sandy Koerner, Roma Steele, Cindy Ridch, Donna Worthington and Amy Everaars.

Sandra had no problem disposing of Mac's No. 1, Ann Thompson (9-5, 9-2, 9-1) and No. 3 Heather Smythe (9-0, 9-0, 9-0). The second game was so short that we thought it was just a warm-up.

JoAnn's methodic style of squash wore Heather down (9-5, 9-3, 9-0) but unfortunately the same strategy didn't work with No. 1. Ann was a bit too agile and worked out a 9-10, 10-8, 9-4, 9-6 victory. JoAnn played well - maybe next time.

Jane "weird-to-the-gills" Forbes-Roberts played superb tactical squash, giving up only 4 points in her first match and 10 in her second. Great squash!

Sandy Kaerner, taken from her death bed, scored two victories for Queen's. She handled both Janice McNuff and Carol Benson very easily.

Roma Steele, who had been playing super squash recently, had great difficulty finding the center of the racquet and corners of the court. She dropped 3 games to Christy Reid. Fortunately, Roma put it all together in her next match to defeat Carol Benson 9-0, 9-2, 9-5.

Our newest recruit, Cindy Reach, had a couple of tremendously long matches. She played Janet Frayer first-winning 9-7, 9-7, 9-5 in thirty minutes and Christy Reid in a long but losing cause (3-2). This match lasted 40 minutes.

Another player tying up courts was Donna Worthington. She played 4 long games setting in the second and third games. She won that match and proceeded to win in four games against a better player than her previous opponent.

Amy Everaars scrambled for every point but it wasn't good enough to defeat a more experienced Dale Tassi. More competition would definitely help Amy's game.

Queen's possesses the most powerful women's squash team since the start of the league 4 years ago. Congratulations to players, and coach, Jan Longhurst.

Test too hard

Thirty professors from the University of Western Ontario tried the 30-minute English literacy test given to freshman university students last fall and complained that it was too difficult.

Only 54 percent of the 6000 students who took the test, administered by the Council of Ontario Universities, managed to pass it. When the results of the test were released several educational experts claimed that they showed a decline in literacy of high school graduates and that the students needed remedial help in English.

One of the professors who tried the test recently said that he couldn't "believe that so many of them (students) managed to pass." Another said that the test was measuring "very fine points of grammar that not even the most literate people can always grasp."

The test consisted of multiple choice questions dealing with grammar and reading comprehension. Complaints about the test (besides its difficulty) were that it was too long for the time given, and that the instructions were at times complicated or ambiguous.

Levesque accident

The man who was struck by a car was still alive according to Coroner Maurice Laniel. However, it was not known whether the car that killed him was the one that was driven by Premier Rene Levesque.

Mr. Levesque told the police that he was driving home after a late night with friends. He came around a curve and saw a man standing in the street waving his arms. He swerved to avoid the man and struck Mr. Trotter, whom he had not seen lying in the street. Police have no idea how Mr. Trotter came to be lying in the street.

Won't give in Fisheries Minister Romeo LeBlanc said Monday that Canada will not give in to "blackmail" by Swiss millionaire Franz Weber. Mr. Weber has offered to raise $2.5 million in order to spare the lives of 170,000 harp seals, this year's hunt limit set by the federal government. He also wants to set up a synthetic fur industry in Newfoundland to provide an alternative to seal hunting. Mr. LeBlanc said that Mr. Weber can set up a fur industry if he likes, but that Canada will not accept money to stop the seal hunt.

Probe pointless

Auditor-General J.J. MacDonell has said that there is no point in looking at Saul Eisenberg's books to see where $8.1 million in atomic reactor sale expenses went.

Mr. Eisenberg wrote that he had not kept all records as he did not know that they would be needed. In addition Mr. Eisenberg wants all results of the audit to be kept confidential. Flora MacDonald complained that crucial documents were being withheld by AECL. Copies of sales contracts with Argentina and Korea were not available to the public accounts committee.

Lorne Gray, former AECL president gave his third and final day of testimony Tuesday. He claimed not to know what the expense money was used for.

If South Korea buys another nuclear reactor, Mr. Eisenberg will handle the deal. However, Mr. Eisenberg will not be paid a finders fee, and the expenses would have to be documented in detail.

Mission massacre

Rev. Dunstan Myerscough is one of two survivors of a massacre of four nuns and three missionaries by black African guerrillas. On Sunday 12 armed guerrillas entered the Roman Catholic mission at St. Paul, 25 miles east of the Rhodesian capital, and forced eight of the people outside. Another nun said she was left behind when she told a guerrilla that she had arthritis and could not move quickly.

After a short argument over who would do the shooting, nine left and the three remaining guerrillas opened fire. Rev. Myerscough said he flung himself to the ground when the shooting started and he escaped unhurt.

There was no apparent motive for the raid.

Tear gas and beatings continue

Last Thursday night a special delegation arrived in Kingston to investigate reports concerning the beating and gassing of two inmates of Millhaven.

This visit came only six days after an official tour of Millhaven by the parliamentary subcommittee on prisons. It was decided that this issue was too pressing to wait for a report by the prison officials before investigating. The MPs stated that they wanted to see the prisoners before tell-tale bruise marks could disappear.

The incident itself happened a week ago yesterday. On Wednesday February 2, just after the subcommittee's prison tour, two electric cell doors jammed, which apparently is not too unusual an occurrence.

One of the prisoners whose door wouldn't work was taken to a solitary confinement cell, but the other prisoner involved refused to leave his cell. He claimed he was in no way responsible for the malfunction.

About 10 a.m. on February 3 (Thursday) six guards were seen spraying his cell with tear gas. Three to four canisters of the gas were sprayed into the cell under the door over a period of about forty minutes. After this the guards entered, beat the prisoner with clubs, and dragged him out. According to accounts, his head was bleeding.

Mr. Scratton, the acting director of Millhaven, says that the doors were jammed on purpose and that the guards used as little tear gas and force as possible. He says such incidents are fairly frequent, but that tear gas is seldom used. He states that the prisoners have been goading the guards lately, but the prisoners claim that it is a group of the guards which is goading and mistreating the inmates.

Upset union

The Kingston union representing outside public workers says that most recent problems, including inadequate snow removal which the City has blamed on the union's refusal to work overtime on weekends, are caused by the large bureaucracy of the works department, which manages to create confusion because of its large size. The union also reaffirms its intention to strike if the City carries out its proposal to decrease the number of garbage department employees by one third.

Not all rallies & protests says Christie

NUS vote a "major setback" - Avis

Queen's students voted against membership in the National Union of Students on the referendum held last Wednesday and Thursday, February 9-10, by the narrow margin of twenty-nine votes; 1,401 to 1,437. A recount by the Chief Elections Returns Officer will be conducted this week to verify the original count.

If the recount upholds the original result, the question of NUS membership will have to be put off until next February as all matters which require a change in the student interest fee may be placed only on the February referendum.

Both AMS President Jamie Avis and AMS President-elect Hugh Christie termed the defeat as a "major setback" for the AMS Executive as NUS membership had been aimed for all year.

According to Avis, part of the blame lay with the lack of formal opposition to the plan of membership in NUS.

Christie expressed different sentiments over the reason for the defeat. "Student organizations in general are in the unfortunate position in that their constituents have a rather distorted impression of their political nature," Christie cites the need for better communication

Cars crash on Princess, student suffers fracture

Ms. Biss underwent surgery Saturday morning at the Hotel Dieu Hospital for multiple fractures of both legs, her left arm and nose. Her fiancé, Mark Carew, 24, of Peterborough, underwent surgery for a fractured leg and pelvis at the Kingston General Hospital.

Both cars were wrecked in the accident and damage has been estimated at $9,000. The driver has been charged with dangerous driving and with driving while under the influence of alcohol.

Cullen vs. Gunder Frank issue sparks protest

Pro foreign fee vote no surprise, ignorant

by Chris Hall, Bernie Helling

Queen's students voted for the second time in approval of differential fees for foreign students. Yet, the results surprised few people involved with the re-introduction of the question to the referendum.

According to Ross Sutherland, co-sponsor of the motion to put the question on the referendum, Queen's students re-affirmed their support of differential fees because, "Queen's is a conservative university. Students here are too introspective, they are not really aware of what is going on outside of campus." However, Sutherland denied that students did not have ample enough opportunity to become familiar with the various sides of the question. Sutherland and others distributed leaflets outlining the finer points of the issue. These leaflets, sponsored by the Kingston Socialists and various other students, provided facts on foreign students in Canada, their usefulness, and the potential financial gains by the Ontario government if foreign students are required to pay more.

Sutherland proceeded to relate the responses to the leaflets by students reading them at the various booths Queen's students voted for. "People expressed a positive reaction to the sheets at our booth in Mackintosh-Corby Hall, but we had a negative response from people at the booth set up in the residences," Sutherland reasoned that most of the students in the residences were first-year students and therefore could not understand the benefits of the "world perspective" that foreign students provided at Queen's and other Canadian universities.

Sutherland also felt that the Ontario Government's plan to implement differential fees was largely an effort to portray the image of taking affirmative action in this time of financial constraint. "The Ontario government is in financial trouble, and by raising tuition fees for foreign students they hope to show the public that they are doing something positive."

AMS President Jamie Avis stated that he was not really surprised by the results as the question was roughly the same as the one placed on the November referendum.

AMS President-elect Hugh Christie expressed a different rationale for the reaffirmation of differential fees. Christie rejected the notion that the outcome could be attributed to conservatism at Queen's. "Queen's is no more conservative than any other university in Ontario. The reason that students voted for differential fees was largely because the question was obscured by confusion over selective differential fees," an unofficial proposal that differential fees should pertain only to students from developed countries. He also felt that the outcome was influenced by the fact that the recent referendum was only a restatement of the referendum held in November. Christie reiterated this concern over the effect of the referendum results on Dr. Parrott, the Minister of Colleges and Universities. "Parrott still has a legitimate example of students supporting differential fees, regardless of the fact that the vote was closer this time," Christie remarked that the only benefit of the referendum was that it showed Dr. Parrott that, "the campus is divided over the issue, not clearly in favour of differential fees as implied by the previous 3-1 majority."

★★★★★ Campus Comment ★★★★★

by Elizabeth Klinck

Leading Marxist development economist, Andre Gunder-Frank, has been denied admission into Canada to attend a conference on "Canada and the Third World". Campus Comment asked Queen's students to comment on whether or not they agreed with this decision and if they felt it was a fair indication of Canada's immigration policy.

Susan Bently

"I don't support the Marxist view, but supposedly in a country where we have freedom of speech and thought, such unwarranted discrimination should not exist." Susan (Arts '78) couldn't understand "what the government is hiding...they should say more because it's not sufficient to not allow the public to know what is going on." She commented that "in a university situation where we are exposed to different philosophies and Marxist principles, it seems only fair that we should be allowed to hear Frank. In an academic sense he should have every right to enter and express his views. He has done nothing, and there is no concrete means for showing that he should be disbarred."

Paul Muir

"While there is an immigration policy pertaining to swapping educational minds to speak at conferences, I assume we have other policies which deal with undesirable characters." Paul (Arts '77) felt that the "man who made the decision to keep Gunder-Frank out of the country 'seemed to be a fairly reasonable man. Bud Cullen... but then politicians say a lot of things to make people happy.' Paul thought that Gunder-Frank's relationship with Pierre Vallieres seemed to be "an innocent enough one...not something to be held against him." He concluded by saying, "It would be fantastic to see someone of a controversial nature here at Queen's."

Sheila Kernin

"Canada is probably under pressure from the United States to ignore Marxism, but I am disappointed in our government in that it doesn't make a more independent move. The conference is discussing problems...viable alternatives. Sheila (Arts '80) felt the decision was "terribly unfair...the government is eliminating the possibility of having free discussion. The attitude of ignoring Marxism is so closeminded." She commented that Canadians often hear that people in the Soviet Union are overly stifled, but "we have just as much propaganda here against Marxism." She concluded her comment by saying "I am surprised that this still happens what with all the apparent improvements in world relationships with China and the U.S.S.R. The Canadian government is defeating the purpose of the whole Third World conference."

Borovay tells how to "raise hell"

by Geoff Gomery

"Pressure without reason is irresponsible, reason without pressure is ineffectual," said Allan Borovay, lawyer for the Canadian Civil Liberties Association (CCLA) speaking on "Strategies for Social Change", Thursday at the Law School.

Mr. Borovay, explained that an activist must ensure that social change correspond to the self-interest of the people involved if it is to be successful.

Mr. Borovay emphasized that the first tool available to any activist is the law. "Many activists ignore the law and all the possibilities that exist within the law." The law is an excellent tool, he said, in "badgering the bureaucrats".

The second weapon he suggested was simple publicity. "One good case is worth all kinds of essays" he emphasized, giving examples of media pressure in use. A black woman attempting to rent an apartment was refused "due to the economic structure of the building," according to a letter. The manager begged her to come back on receiving a telephone call from the Toronto Star, asking about this. Borovay explained that often the simple threat of publicity would be enough.

Another publicity weapon he has used is the "survey technique". Mr. Borovay cited examples in which a CCLA survey had discovered that the Toronto Fire Department included only two non-whites, or that a public housing project comprised only whites, at an income level at least twice that of the local native peoples.

Another technique was to "arrange a happening". Mr. Borovay explained how the CCLA had organized a rally attracting over 1000 people to protest a police drug raid, and had succeeded in bringing sufficient pressure to bear to force the creation in Ontario of an independent Royal Commission to investigate the raid.

Mr. Borovay advocated methods of lawful disruption, such as strikes, in pushing for change. He noted a success in fighting the "protestant indoctrination" of children of all religions in the schools of some Ontario communities. By canvassing Jewish households, the CCLA organized 400 requests for exemption in one school, rendering the program unworkable in that neighbourhood. Eventually it was dropped.

The speaker gave a similar example dealing with religion in schools to illustrate his method of "baiting the adversary". In principle, "If you get someone who is enough of a damn fool, he will win your case for you."

In concluding his discussion of strategies Mr. Borovay mentioned coalition politics, but warned against permanent alliances between groups in place of limited coalitions with a specific purpose. He mentioned that, in organizing meetings, he always made a point of asking for a small room, and of introducing everybody in the room to the object of the protest.

Mr. Borovay ended his speech making mention of some of the problems in the civil liberties movement. One was "the mindless militant," who advocated violence as a technique. He said these people "threaten the one institution that can yet redeem our society: the political democratic processes." He noted that this radicalism leads to a reaction from other elements of society, and suggested that the activities of the SDS in the US might have led in part to the election victory of Nixon and Agnew.

Conversely the "timid moderate" who believes "but is not prepared to engage in good old-fashioned conflict is of little help."

In response to questions from the audience, Mr. Borovay defended a piece-meal approach to issues, calling himself "a disjointed incrementalist" and saying "our role is to reduce some kind of the hell on earth" and not to be "committed to some kind of a total utopia."

When asked about the direction of social change, Mr. Borovay talked of comparing one person's freedom with another, stressing his acceptance of democracy but not necessarily capitalism. "This system is bad, but any other system is infinitely worse," he said in conversation afterwards.

Mr. Borovay stressed that their commitment was not to individuals but to the ideals behind them. The CCLA will not accept government money grants to preserve its independence, he pointed out. "I don't care who is in power, our role is to raise hell with them."

OSAP is increased

by Anne Johnson

Dr. Harry Parrot, Ontario's Minister of Colleges and Universities has announced that the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) for 1977-78 will be increased slightly to adjust to the rise in the cost of living. The 1977-78 grants budget for OSAP is $74 million, up $13 million from the current year. The tuition fee increases will be taken directly into account in calculating the amount of assistance that students can receive.

Students' living allowances under OSAP will be increased to $61 per week, up from $57 this year. The maximum allowance for books has also been increased by 11 percent.

OSAP provides loans and grants to Ontario post-secondary students who have insufficient money to cope with their living expenses and tuition fees. The amount of assistance made available depends on the students' educational costs and financial resources. Assistance up to $1000 will be regarded as a repayable loan, and those needing additional assistance will usually receive it in the form of a provincial government grant.

AMS President, Jamie Avis, thought it very likely that significant changes in the OSAP program will be made within the next few years. The McKeough-Henderson Report of late 1975 recommended that the government reduce or completely cut-out the grant portion of OSAP. The Ontario Government has not formally responded to these recommendations, preferring to refrain from committing itself until it had considered the report of its Interim Committee on Student Assistance, which will be released shortly.

Who came to breakfast?

By Fiona Grieve

The slide-tape show "Guess Who's Coming to Breakfast" presented Tuesday night as part of the lecture series on the Christian and Corporate Control pointed out that corporations of incredible size control many of the things we commonly have on our breakfast table. It focused on sugar produced and refined by Grand and Western (which also backs films such as "Dog Day Afternoon" and "The Godfather" and TV shows such as "Happy Days").

The question raised was how responsible Grand and Western should be to the people of the Dominican Republic because of the control the company has over their economy. Also, more specifically, the value of sugar has risen significantly in recent years, but wages for sugar-cutters have been lowered since 1963. The presentation seemed to suggest that it was maximizing profit without considering the harmful effects on human lives that caused the current situation.

Reggie McQuaid from GATT-fly in Toronto led the discussion on the need for a change in attitudes so that business does consider human cost as well as dollars and cents in its decisions. He pointed out that many of the decision-makers in the larger corporations are good men but they just seem to be able to see their decision-making on the job in terms of the balance sheet. He mentioned some of the work his organization had been doing: government lobbying and arranging a sugar-worker's conference in the Caribbean. He also made reference to the fact that there is currently no sugar pact partly because of the hard line Canada took in refusing even reasonable increases in the price of sugar.

Kehoe, Cyr, elected to top spots

Mike Kehoe has won the election as the President of the Commerce faculty defeating Denis Beausejour by a vote of 256 to 131. During the campaign, Kehoe said he felt the Commerce Society constitution needed a complete revamping and that he would oversee an aggressive effort to realize the objective of having a Commerce Society pub or house.

In other Commerce elections the results were as follows: For Vice-President: Culliton 169, Cyr 212 (elected). For Senior AMS Rep.: Love 237 (elected), Thwaites 145. For Social Convenor: Barker 212 (elected) Brining 162. The results for the Commerce Bews Stick election are still unavailable. Acclaimed were Hugh Dodd, Jr. AMS Rep., Suzie Greenberg, Secretary, Daryl Schmidt, WIC Stick and Sheila Murray, Treasurer.

In the recount of the ballots for ASUS Rep. to AMS Outer Council (two year term) the results were: Brisbin 256, Evans 346 (elected), Fennell 432 (elected), Francis 169 and Ng 317.

The following results were omitted from the Friday results, for AMS Reps. from ASUS: Kaduck 193, Lewarne 362 (elected), McNeil 450 (elected), Meredith 440 (elected).

John Sullivan, a second year Politics student, was elected Chairman of the Leonard Field Residence Council (LFRC) by a vote of 182-132 last Thursday. Mr. Sullivan will take office on March 1, for a term of one year.

The LFRC is the student governing body for the Leonard Field residences.

Project deadline extended

by Anne Johnson

The deadline for the submission of applications for the Young Canada Works Projects has been extended until February 18, the Canadian Manpower and Immigration department announced recently. This decision reverses the one made earlier by Bud Cullen, minister of that department.

Mr. Jim Cook, of Kingston's Canada Manpower Center said that there had been "a lot of applications" and that there had been many requests to have the deadline extended. He pointed out that "the bad weather would have made it difficult for the applicants to get around and get sponsors." Cook added that it was "the right thing to do," and that people around the University undoubtedly would be happy about it.

The program was instituted to provide summer employment for students wishing to improve their cities or regions, but programs which have organizational sponsorship are to be given preference over other submissions.

The National Union of Students and Kingston MP Flora MacDonald had lobbied for an extension of the deadline for the Kingston area.

Saw women as sexual subjects, not as objects

Dear Editor:

Michael Fox failed to hear the most important part of Germaine Greer's message. It was stated several times and presented to the women in the audience: "Consider your own priorities. For fear of destroying a foetus we end up damaging ourselves." "We are caught again in the bind of self-sacrifice." "Consider your own motives." "What are we doing to ourselves?" "If contraceptives work, is everything fine?" "Is it your duty to be accessible? Must we engage in female self-sacrifice?"

Perhaps Fox didn't hear these comments because in "the relations of flesh and sentiment" they do not speak to him. People involved in the women's liberation movement are often criticized for not dealing with the day-to-day, practical aspects of our sexuality. Greer had the insight to approach the issue from the position of women as sexual subjects—rather than merely decrying the objectification of females as sex objects.

The gist of her central argument was as follows: We (women) have a problem. Most of the time we don't want to get pregnant as a result of fucking with a man. The most effective methods of preventing pregnancy (short of sterilization, which most college-aged females understandably are not willing to undergo)—namely, the pill and the I.U.D., are also the most damaging to our health. The technology of messier, less effective, but less injurious methods such as the diaphragm has not been updated for decades.

What can we (women) do? We could abstain—for some women that might be a realistic alternative, as might masturbation. We may choose to be homosexual. If we choose to engage in sexual activity with men, we might explore other than genitally-directed activity—"polymorphous expressions." If we choose sexual intercourse, perhaps we could try coitus interruptus. Or perhaps we could reduce the frequency of fucking and use safe, relatively less effective contraception (condoms, diaphragms) backed up with abortion if we become pregnant. Clearly, we do not have to be always accessible nor do we need to injure our health. Birth control is neither totally safe nor totally effective—often times we jeopardize our health using "effective" contraception.

Again still treating women as sexual subjects (i.e. active participants), Greer expressed the belief that our availability and accessibility might be threatening to men. Since she was questioning the value of this accessibility, I find it hard to understand how Fox derived the implication that "... women will call the tune from now on, and men will dance... if we can." I thought the "cock-crinkling" fact was that men were being required to perform too often, again under pressure of increased female accessibility. If women choose to reduce their accessibility, then presumably, fewer "cocks" would be "crinkled." Who knows—erections might flourish if performance wasn't always required!

Fox's critique has a "what about me?" ring to it. Well Michael, why not look to yourself? You're the one who states in your last paragraph that "... we need... someone... to work for the cause of increased understanding on all sides, from all perspectives." Why not increase your understanding by listening to someone speaking from the perspective of women, rather than dwelling emotionally on the spots where Germaine chose to make a few witticisms at the expense of some males?

Beth Michalka

Dear Editor:

After reading Prof. Fox's article "What has Greer left us with?" (Journal, February 8) I feel moved to say a few words in defense of a lady who left me smiling warmly on a very cold day.

It is telling to compare general impressions. Mr. Fox begins with some concessions: "Germaine Greer is dedicated, witty, spontaneous, gifted, urbane, knowledgeable—perhaps even brilliant." Unfortunately these generous qualities prove insufficient to carry the day, and Fox concludes Ms. Greer "has grown weary of men" and "is still hung up... on getting back at men, on dishing out what men have dished out for so long." On the contrary, I found a person who seemed glad to be alive, sensitive to her sexuality, and yes, perhaps even fond of men. She showed none of the humorlessness so characteristic of some of her more bloodthirsty sisters.

Of course it would not only be "bizarre" but absurd to suggest "that there is no reason to think that penile-vaginal contact has anything (his emphasis) important to do with sexual gratification or love." What is less clear is why Mr. Fox, or anyone else, would think Germaine Greer made that suggestion. A more balanced paraphrase might read that there is nothing sacred or compulsory about burying a penis in a vagina and that, in any event, intromission should be the result of informed choice. Ms. Greer did overstate her case somewhat, but this observation pales when we remember her mission. Presumably she came to Queen's to say something true, undeniably she came to give Queen's someone to gawk at.

Finally, I'm more than a little astounded that a twentieth century philosopher should try to draw anybody into a hoary and profitless debate about what is or is not "natural."

Frans Van de Ven

Pres-elect Christie:

Learning comes first

by Hugh Christie, A.M.S. President-Elect

The primary function of the A.M.S. is to ensure that Queen's students are afforded a stimulating and enjoyable atmosphere in which to learn. Next year's A.M.S. executive intends to concentrate on exposing the Queen's community to as varied a collection of ideas and perspectives, in the form of speakers, films and debates, as possible. Our first responsibility, then, is to the maintenance of the educational environment at Queen's.

As well, we see support of the social and cultural aspect of Queen's as our responsibility. Because Queen's is a resident University, we need to plan our own activities much more than other Universities. The A.M.S. pub, concerts, and sponsorship of other events will all continue to draw our attention and direction.

The Queen's student interest fee is one of the largest in Canada. We feel that in these times of financial constraint it is incumbent on the A.M.S. to economize wherever the quality of services will not be affected, to streamline its operations as much as possible, to minimize any increases in this already very large fee.

A very real problem that exists on campus has been brought to light by the recent decision not to join the National Union of Students. Due to insufficient information flow between students and their organizations, we have become alienated from our representatives, namely OFS and NUS. This lack of information exchange has resulted in the organizations not being as representative of student views as they should be. As well, students have an inaccurate impression of what these groups do. While it is certainly not the belief of next year's executive that these institutions are perfect, we do see a pressing need for student organizations which are truly representative of student opinion at the provincial and national level. With this firm belief in mind, the A.M.S. will speak with as strong a voice as possible within these organizations in the next years. We must bring them back to what students want them to, indeed demand that they, be.

As well, next year's executive intends to try and bridge the information gap which exists between OFS and the campus at large. As long as students only hear of rallies and protests, they have every reason to suspect OFS of misrepresenting their interests. But student organizations can, and do, do much more constructive things. Students should have every opportunity to be informed on what OFS is doing. We will attempt to afford them that opportunity. Student organizations are not some group of people "out there", they are us. We must know what they are doing, and they must act only on our direction.

Feels Enders was misquoted

Dear Editor:

In last Friday's edition of the Journal, your reporter, Rob Reynolds, quoted Thomas Enders as having said "A nightmare within the United States and within Vietnam. This is not a period of American history that will be looked back on with pride."

My understanding of the function of a reporter is that he relay the facts and not distort them. In fact, the word Vietnam was not used by Mr. Enders in this context, but was added by a member of the audience. This changes the sense of the remark rather dramatically.

If Mr. Reynolds is unable to exercise discretion in his reporting, then perhaps the editors could do so for him.

Eatons: a new palace in Toronto

by Carol Town

Those Queen's (TO'ers) who head home for the holidays next week can be part of a new downtown experience for the Eaton's Centre, Toronto's latest shopping "palace" has opened in a blaze of consumer glory. Ontario's Lieutenant Governor, Pauline McGibbon, graciously officiated at the ribbon-cutting ceremony which, for many Torontonians, is probably the highlight of the buying season. According to the Globe and Mail, which splashed the story over its front page last Wednesday, hundreds of loyal Canadian subjects were present at the gala opening. For both retailer and consumer alike it was a day of good cheer (not unlike that of December 24th) as sales boomed throughout the downtown area.

Isn't it grand that covered walks, soft Musak and a pocketful of credit cards has made modern shopping such an easy and pleasant experience, indeed one to Southern Ontario's favorite pastimes? After all, the more we buy (of excess trivia or otherwise), the more the economy is stimulated, which in turn, leads to the creation of more jobs and results in a better and happier Canadian society. Right? Of course not.

Canada, and indeed all nations in the future, must strive to follow the consumer ethic or else suffocate under a globe full of garbage. Even Trudeau told us we'll have to tighten our belts and re-orient our thinking. But how can our thoughts and values change as long as consumerism dominates society? New "palaces" like the Eaton Centre, which encourage people to buy more unnecessary things (and must cost a fortune to heat) in no way benefit our society. It is a sad fact that they are advertised in the front pages of leading newspapers and are supported by our heads of state.

Liberal Column ————— by Sheilagh Dunn

No time for political inflexibility

The situation between Quebec and the rest of Canada will remain the main topic of conversation for journalists, political scientists, politicians and all Canadians for some time. However, I think it is useful to see the developments as a rational progression towards a denouement when this will occur is another question.

Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Levesque are too concerned and intelligent to deal with the current situation haphazardly. Their statements, outbursts and speeches present vastly diverging points of view but these are only the prologue to a more intense, rational discussion of the future of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau's demand for an early referendum and his statement that the separation of Quebec from Canada would destabilize the world are opening shots. He can get a feel of the game, his opponent and the reactions of the spectators by such moves. Mr. Levesque's speech to the New York financiers was a calculated offensive tactic. By appearing tough-minded and intractable from the beginning, Mr. Levesque hopes to establish an image and credibility, forcing the federal side to adapt to his demands. But both sides cannot afford to be inflexible, or Canada is doomed to split.

The future negotiations can be regarded as a bargaining process and as an actual debate. A favourite trick in bargaining is to ask for more than one really wants, hoping for an eventual compromise. Is this tactic what drives Mr. Levesque to speak unequivocally of separation? Does he really want Quebec to remain within Canada but is fighting for recognition of Quebec's "special status"?

From another point of view, a debate will ensure between constitutional experts, economists and strategists of both sides. Already, Trudeau has set up a Committee on National Unity to prepare the federal case against the resolution that Quebec should separate from Canada. Both sides need time to build up their factual and verbal arsenal; so we have Levesque and Trudeau presently slugging it out in the daily press.

It is a wise move on the part of Ontario's Premier, William Davis, to cool the separation issue in Ontario-Quebec dealings. What Quebec does not need is nine provincial governments on its back. What Canada does need is a committed, united federal front to show Quebec its support for Confederation.

This upcoming debate will involve more rhetoric and emotion concerning the "spirit" of Canada and the Canadian identity. This is unavoidable when the separation of Quebec would deprive Canada of her prime distinctive characteristic.

Canada is still trying to define herself and the history, culture and language of Quebec has always been accepted as an integral part of the Canadian identity.

The implications of Quebec's separation are too wide-ranging to be decided on economic issues alone. Quebec needs a guarantee that the French language and culture will be accepted by all Canadians. If Canada is to stay together, Canadians from all regions must put aside their parochial interests and broaden their point of view to a national level. The threat of Quebec's separation might yet unite the disparate regions of Canada into one, genuine country. Unfortunately, it's an extreme way of achieving this unity.

Felt Loughheed showed bias with the article

Dear Editor

In response to the letter to the editor entitled "Com. Soc. Pres. Praises New Publication" (Tuesday, February 8, p. 25.) written by Steve Loughheed Commerce President

Mr. Loughheed
You owe the entire Commerce Society and Presidential Candidates for next year's executive a formal apology. I question your motive for submitting the article concerning the publication "Inquiry on Business." This letter is not concerned with the publication itself, for I agree that the fullest recognition should be given to all those who are responsible for its up and coming publication.

I find it rather coincidental, however, that your letter to the editor appeared in the "election edition of the Journal." I feel that your article revealed an "obvious" bias and may possibly have some influence on the forthcoming election outcome. Whether it does or not is irrelevant. The mere fact that it might makes it your responsibility, as President, to ensure that the article appear in an alternate edition. (May I suggest closer to the publication date?)

Note: This article was submitted to the Journal prior to election results.

Name withheld by request.

Listiak defends Richler review

Dear Editor:

I would like to respond to Maureen Piercy's response to my response to Mordecai Richler because it appears that Ms. Piercy and possibly others missed the main point of my comments.

Ms. Piercy feels that I "sociologically sabotaged" Mr. Richler, that I am resentful and arrogant, and that the whole thing was in poor taste. Maybe it is sociological sabotage to call what I see the Emperor's New Clothes.

However, if the Emperor was hoodwinked, we have been ripped off. The Point is one that Mr. Richler agrees with and uses himself—it relates to Excellence and Recognition (read to See and Reward). In the article, "Pucksure," Mr. Richler says that NHL hockey is not good quality hockey and we should pay (Reward) only the best—and we deserve the Best. If we don't see the best but are paying for the Best, Mr. Richler says we should speak up. Which he does. But so have countless others long before him.

People get mad at paying top buck to Stars who don't Perform. They expect Stars to provide more than merely "human" and "reasonably entertaining" Shows. That's the Name of the Game. And if you're in the Game you have to play by the rules or pay the price. Remember the reaction to Star Anthony Davis, late of the Toronto Argonauts? He got shot down.

Mordecai Richler's Public Performances are as much a part of his work as his literary efforts. At this point, I'm not saying anything about his literary performance. Moreover, I have nothing against traveling, living, or even being born out of Canada. But I would argue that Mr. Richler's contributions, whatever they may be, must be judged in terms of his Total Performance and Sphere of Influence. I am trying to point some attention to an area that has remained somewhat obscure.

I never implied that Mr. Richler's journalism is "badly written." What I said is that its content is trite, and does not go beyond the line of the Eastern Elite. He is being paid top dollar in the Star Game to Say Things and Shoot Well. Queen's paid top dollar to bring in a Star who insulted the intelligence of his audience—not by Saying Things badly, but by Saying Nothing content-wise. He hit no Targets. Entertainment, humanity, and prescriptions have nothing to do with it. (Compare the Germaine Greer controversy.)

Now that makes me mad. What makes me resentful is that Mordecai Richler exploits his Star Status and our lack of understanding of the Star Game to peddle other (more than the three cited) Say Nothing Performances for top dollar to Media and Audiences who want something Canadian. And gets away with it.

The Public Arena is a small place. Stars who dominate the Arena have to fight to stay on Top. Stars who can't or won't Shoot deserve to be Shot. It helps the Stars get their acts together. And, ultimately, it gets them out of there. Others are working for their Shot.

Is it arrogant to want and expect the Game to be played according to the rules? Is it in poor taste to say NHL hockey is a rip-off?

Alan Listiak

A logical argument

by Dr. D. L. C. MacLachlan

It has been revealed to the world at large that only a small fraction of Queen's students are literate. Fortunately, no survey has been carried out to reveal how small a proportion is thinking logically. My suspicion is, however, that illogicality of a more or less serious degree is fairly widespread. If this is so, what is to be done about it? Most intellectual disciplines involve a very considerable use or argument, and it is important that the arguments used be logically sound. It is also important that any fallacies in the arguments of the enemy camp be exposed and refuted.

In government, the answer to a problem is to set up a Royal Commission or Task Force; in a university, the answer is to establish a course. But a course in logic already exists, taught by the Department of Philosophy. Although it has a decent enrolment, the members of the class constitute only an insignificant fraction of the student body. Nor is it true that the members of this class are the most illogical students in the university, who are presumably most in need of the logical training. On the contrary, the most illogical students are those who tend to avoid a course in logic like the plague.

Part of the difficulty is that in dealing with the basic problem of student illogicality, a course in logic is of limited effectiveness. It is no magic key which can transform a logical incompetent into a person with a lucid command of argumentative discourse, just as no course in composition can by itself transform the poor writer into a master of English prose. In the main, we learn to develop our logical skills in a gradual and informal way, by our construction and evaluation of many actual arguments in everyday life and during our study of other subjects.

NO MAGIC KEY

Although the study of logic is no magic key, we must not go to the other extreme and condemn it as utterly useless. A course in logic certainly does some good, although exactly how much good it does is difficult to assess, and probably varies considerably from student to student. At the very least, it focusses the attention of the student on the distinction between good and bad arguments and on the importance of organizing intellectual discourse so that it has an argumentative structure.

The development of a capacity for lucid argument is not the only function of a course in logic, however. Even those who already possess a high degree of native logical skill can benefit from the study of logic, because it systematizes this whole area of their experience. Most people, when presented with the argument "All dogs are mammals: all spaniels are dogs; therefore, all spaniels are mammals" would recognize that this is a logically valid argument such that, given the truth of the premises, the truth of the conclusion follows as a matter of logical necessity. What the logician can do is to explain that this argument is valid because it is a member of a certain class of valid arguments, all of which exhibit the same logical form or structure. The form or structure can be expressed as follows: "All M are P. All S are M. Therefore, All S are P." Particular arguments can be constructed which exhibit this form by substituting for S, M, and P expressions referring to a class of things, persons or events. All such arguments are logically valid. Notice that such arguments are valid, even if they have false premises. An argument with false premises can be logically valid, provided that its conclusion would necessarily be true, if its premises were true.

There is one thing which both complicates the job of the logician and at the same time makes his work more valuable. Statements like "All dogs are mammals" are called by logicians "universal affirmative" statements. Unfortunately, not all universal affirmative statements are made by sentences exhibiting the "All...are..." pattern. The resources of our language are very rich, and universal affirmative statements can be made in a large variety of ways. "Every dog has his day" is a universal affirmative statement and so, rather heavily disguised, is "If a dog is rabid, then it must be destroyed."

Part of the job of the logician, when checking the validity of arguments used or ordinary life, is to identify the kinds of statements employed, rewriting them using the standard forms of sentences authorized in his system. This is called "rewriting in logical form". The two examples given above would become respectively, "All dogs are creatures which have their day" and "All rabid dogs are creatures which must be destroyed". Once arguments have been rewritten in logical form, their validity can be tested, using the systematic rules developed by the science of logic.

MATTER OF DEFINITION

Although the main function of logic is to set out systematically theologically valid argument patterns determining which arguments are acceptable and which are not, the logician is also concerned with a number of less formal considerations connected with the conduct of intellectual discourse. One such topic is definition. I can illustrate how logic can help in this area by showing how it illuminates the contentious issue about the literacy of Queen's students to which I alluded at the beginning. In the Normal report, "literate" students are defined as "those whose standard of writing is Grade A". This is what the Logic Textbooks call a "stipulative" definition. The author is stipulating the sense in which he proposes to use a certain word, rather than the meaning which the word usually has. Part of the problem in some reactions to the report is that it has not been generally realized that the word "literate" is being used in this special, stipulated sense.

Now, logicians recognize the right of an author to use a word in his own special sense, provided that he indicates clearly what that sense is. This is the right assumed in an extreme form by Humpty Dumpty in Through the Looking Glass when he says "When I use a word, it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less". Lewis Carroll was himself a logician and knew all about stipulative definition. While recognizing the rights of Humpty Dumpty, logicians point out, however, that there are certain dangers in this procedure. The danger lies in the ambiguity between the special defined sense of the word and its ordinary sense. An author may confuse himself through this ambiguity, sliding from one sense to the other. And even if he is perfectly clear and consistent, there may be widespread confusion among his readers.

You need an old lover now

Murray McLauchlan: In Transition

by Sandy Graham

Murray McLauchlan didn't play the old songs. At one point in his concert last Sunday night at Grant Hall he ignored a request for "Farmer's Song" and chose instead to launch into yet another hard rocker. I don't know how symbolic that was, but it did prove one thing: he wasn't singing what the audience wanted to hear. He was called back for an encore, but it was probably because they wanted something familiar. The set was, for the most part a collection of newer songs, some as yet unrecorded. But the novelty didn't seem to satisfy those around me.

McLauchlan's new philosophy was evident in just about every song he performed. Of course, the mere presence of the Silver Tractors did more to destroy one's old images than anything McLauchlan could do alone. A couple of his songs owed much to this change. One, just written on the road, was about northern Ontario and its "Hard Rock Towns". It was a grinding, dirty story of life north of Sudbury, driven by Gene Martynec's electric guitar riffs. A little closer to the "boys in the band" theme was one he wrote for the Tractors. Another raunchy number, it featured electric trade-offs between McLauchlan and Martynec, which seemed to a crescendo before the former finally conceded to the latter's abilities.

Now that he was started, McLauchlan let loose with a whole string of thrusts and power-chording. "Slingback Shoes" was followed by a "Strange Song" and a soaring version of "Little Dreamer". I really couldn't believe this was McLauchlan. I was hearing. He bulled his way through a few more numbers, bringing the band to its best with "Honky Red", a stinging blues dedicated to Black Jack MacDonald. Very few people seemed impressed.

All of this did go to prove the excellence of Martynec. A rather diminutive fellow sitting off in the shadows, he reminded one of a shy Leon Redbone. When he took up his guitar, however, the similarity ended. Although he would play his few bars of solos in a polite, concise way and then lapse back into anonymity, his moments of spotlighted glory were some of the most biting yet lyrical it has ever been my pleasure to experience. I can't understand why they didn't bring the house down when he was introduced.

McLauchlan and the band were not without their quiet moments. The singer delivered a thoughtful version of "Sweeping the Spotlight Away", his essay on the timelessness of Emmet Kelly, the world-famous clown. A major theme which has emerged in McLauchlan's songs of late was expressed here. He sings of people "laughing at a sad-faced clown," in a verse from "Meetcha At The Bottom" he laments, "everyone loves a loser, they love to see him pay his dues." Does he honestly feel that the whole world is against his characters? Perhaps this would explain his more aggressive stance. "Christ, somebody's got to come on strong, it's getting too hard to get along."

Ben Mink played an important role in "La Guerre". His plaintive violin solo against a background of military snares, was hauntingly reminiscent of a lone bugler. McLauchlan sang with anger here, and somehow the awkward French accent seemed to suit the mood of the song.

Nevertheless, some songs were notably absent. There were no tunes included from before the "Sweeping" album. The only singles performed were "Little Drummer" and the show opener, "Down By the Henry Moore". He used the piano for only two selections, neither of which really showed off his talents. At times, the unfamiliarity of the music coupled with all-too-familiar arrangements proved less than exciting.

While the instrumentation was at least always good and the group tight, the vocals left something to be desired. Part of the blame can be put on a sound system which made much of what he sang unintelligible. Even so, there was a sameness to McLauchlan's voice, he sang the slow tunes just like the fast ones. A slightly more soulful reading of one or two of his blue-influenced compositions would have been quite effective. I suppose its part of McLauchlan's style to always deliver the straight goods, not that there's anything wrong with that. For the first half-hour.

It was the quality of the music which carried the show. I, for one, quite enjoyed the exploration and didn't mind being considered a witness to "a rehearsal of his next album". If McLauchlan can manage to solidify his hold on the new image, we can expect great things from him. I would tend to look on Sunday night as a transitional concert; after all, didn't the fans boo when Dylan went electric? The reaction wasn't as strong at Grant Hall, but the influence could be.

Erratum

An error was made on Page 15 of the Journal of Friday, February 11, 1977. In the article on Jane Coop, we reported that Ms. Coop would be performing Sunday, February 15. That should have read TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15 [TODAY]. The concert will be held tonight in Grant Hall at 8:30pm. Tickets are available at the Performing Arts box office, or at the door. Our apologies to all concerned for any inconvenience.

University Arts - Why?

by Eric Hughes

Traditionally, universities are referred to as 'institutes of learning'. But, the types of learning and the uses to which this learning has been put have done anything but follow any sort of traditional path. In fact, though many will deny it, the subjects and objects of university education have, more or less, travelled in the wake of those of our developing society. This has left many students in a rather difficult situation because, as far as society is concerned, many of us have been educated into obsolescence.

Today's society is geared more and more towards the utilitarian. Suddenly, the free and easy world of ten years ago has become the get-ahead world of the post W.W.I. era. The life-blood is being sucked out of many of our aesthetic values and we are being left with shells that do nothing but produce.

So, here we are in university - an institution formerly dedicated to knowledge as a means and an end - in a society whose ultimate end is some sort of tangible product - and even worse than tangible, useful.

It's an old argument, and as is the case with most of its kind, it has been forgotten in the echo chamber of repetition and short-term solution. But still, people like myself are graduating with the horrible feeling that we can't 'do' anything.

It seems ironic, too, that university arts programmes and, in large part, arts students seem to have as a long-term goal - teaching, i.e. teaching others to move through the educational system and become, in turn, teachers.

However, there are those of us in the university arts community who have no intention of teaching. What use can we (assuming that we want to make our years at school useful for something beyond themselves) make of our education?

Maybe we should look at what we have studied and see where this can fit into some sort of future life. Here, I can only speak for myself. Aside from learning a particular way of thinking (i.e. the kind that is acceptable - in the academic sense - to the university community), I find that I have learned little in the way of skills as a direct result of my university courses. In fact, as far as useful abilities and techniques are concerned, I have benefitted more from non-credit, extracurricular activities than I have from any classroom work I may have done. Of course, had I not been in university, I would never have had the opportunity to participate in these activities, so, indirectly I have derived great and useful benefit from my time at Queen's.

But in the classroom we are victims of, and party to, the university's curiously ambivalent attitude towards practical work. The fact that creative writing is almost exclusively dealt with in terms of essays, a form very rarely seen outside of the academic community, is one damning example among many.

I don't want to sound as if I am complaining. I knew what I was getting into when I came here. I hope we all did. I came to learn about the arts, and for the most part, have done just that. It is unfortunate that I cannot, in any specific way, use that knowledge; and it is an indication of society's direction and my inclination to follow it (albeit against my more 'refined' instincts) that I want to 'use' my learning. In any case, and I suspect in many others, a university arts education's most lasting effect is rather roundabout in that it more or less shows us that there are corridors. It is up to us to decide which ones are real, which imaginary, which ones lead to others, which end after several steps. And unless one is particularly ambitious or anxious to be "useful", there is a lot of selfish pleasure to be derived from university arts and its obsolescent way of existence.

What Ontario collects

Three paintings from the Permanent Collection of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre are travelling round the Province of Ontario with the Art Gallery of Ontario's exhibition The Ontario Community Collects. The exhibition is being held in the Art Centre's main gallery until March 27.

The Ontario Community Collects features paintings, watercolours and pastels dating from 1766 to 1972. They are all by Canadian artists or by artists who worked in Canada prior to Confederation. They were selected from art galleries, museums, universities, libraries and other public institutions in the Province of Ontario, excluding the National Collections in Ottawa. The travelling of the exhibition will allow one region of Ontario to appreciate what another region is collecting.

The three paintings from the Agnes Etherington collection are Portrait of a Lady by Berton (1806-1892), Souriantle (1955) by Borduas and Michael Snow's News (1959). The painting Vegeaus Marins by Alfred Pellán, the property of the Art Collection Society of Kingston, is also circulating with this exhibition.

The gathering of such a chronological range of Canadian painting in one place at one time is both interesting and useful from a teaching and from a learning standpoint, and it continues until March 27.

Two fine comic pieces

by Eric Hughes

The Queen's Drama Department's popular Chronicles series is back after a too long absence - and it's back with a vengeance. Its new vehicle consists of two fine comic pieces directed and performed with aplomb.

The opener, Noel Coward's early play, Weatherwise, deals with a rather upper-crust English family whose congenial life is disrupted by an unexpected ouija-board message from Queen Victoria. Suddenly, mother begins to bark, growl and bite her children. With the "help" of a madcap psychoanalyst, things violently vault that fine line between confusion and insanity.

The performances were effectively exaggerated, for the most part (with just the occasional blooper due to over-reaction at inappropriate moments). Of special note were Glenda Sarty as the wide-eyed, slinky, flapperesque Cynthia and Becky Farrar as her more demure but equally wide-eyed sister Violet. Robb Paterson gave us a wonderfully larger than life Dr. Wickenham, the psychoanalyst. His comic-opera German accent, arched-eyebrows and thrown-away lines fit the mood of the piece to a 'T'.

My main criticism (admittedly a small one) is this. More attention could be paid to the British accents which were consistent only in their inconsistency. However, this detracted little from a well-written play which was well-performed.

Joe Orton's Ruffian on the Stair is a strangely moving, ridiculously funny black comedy. It deals with a woman, the man she lives with, and a stranger who harasses first the one and then the other. It's terms are death, sex, race, religion and Irishmen, (what else is there?)

Toomas Anniko as the man, Virginia Greig as the woman and Joe Laxton as the stranger created a very watchable, listenable and laughable team. Their ensemble work was simply a joy. Anniko's Mike could easily have just stepped out of a boxing ring. Laxton worked with a sinister charm that left us wondering exactly what was going on throughout the entire play just the right touch with Orton.

But the performance of the entire evening was Ms. Greig's. She worked in such a beautifully understated way that, at times, the walls of the theatre seemed to vanish and we felt ourselves being physically pulled into her apartment. She was appropriately harried but never frantic. In fact, her comedy had a wonderfully pathetic quality that created instant sympathy for her Joyce - regardless of that character's shady past.

The choice of these two plays was a particularly clever one. Both are comedies of manners. Both eventually fall into the free-flowing stream of the ridiculous. But each play demands its own, individual treatment. It is a tribute to Mr. Knight and to all the performers that, on the same stage, two such different and yet such similar plays can be performed with such success.

Place second at Devils Glen

by Pork

The fourth race of the Ontario Universities' highly prestigious Ski circuit was held at Devil's Glen in the Collingwood area, last Friday. Devil's Glen possesses one of the steepest and most consistent pitches of all areas in Southern Ontario - great for a good slalom race. Due to high temperatures snow conditions were soft and the course rapidly became rutted. The race was won by Remi Cloutier, a former National Team member, skiing for Guelph University. He swept the field with a time of 88.6 sec., followed by a Finn from Brock University and Mark Bell from U. of T.

Although Slalom Jock Neilson was not present, the Queen's Men (?) regained the form they had temporarily lost and once again came through with an impressive second place finish. Little Timmy Wardrop, even without his Gross Greens, managed to place seventh out of a field of 75. Timmy, going into the latter part of the series, occupies fifth place in the over-all individual standings. Although Reid Cecil Drury, encountered some problems in the lower half of the course, Cecil managed to bull his way into tenth place. The other strong finishers were Rob and Gripper and Rob Dakers. "Prenelli on the Road and Who on the Skis", (Brian Fitzpatrick) had an excellent first run. However, it is speculated that the presence of the U. of T. Girls' Team may have distracted him on the pitch.

The overall team standings after four races are U. of T. in first place with 36 points only one point ahead of Queen's. Western is third with 31 points, followed by York University with 27 points. Some strong finishes in the Ontario University Championships could easily put Queen's in first spot. The Women's Team have their legs crossed (no wonder they are skiing so poorly).

Sue Graves, also a National Team member, skied to victory in the women's race. Skiing for Waterloo, Sue completed the course in 90.77 sec. Marilyn Robbins from Western came second followed by Kathy Chalmers from Waterloo. The top Queen's finisher was Jane McGillivray who came fourth. Jane has been skiing consistently well throughout the whole season. After four races, she is fourth in the individual standings. As for the rest of the Queen's team, they have fallen consistently well. Actually it is part of their Samaritan Strategy to let other teams enjoy the fruits of victory.

The teams results of the fourth race were Waterloo in first place followed by Western and Guelph. However, Queen's Women with the finishes of Jane McGillivray, Robin Jonathan r.

McLeod, Wendy Bethune & Mary Chaput managed to pull the team all the way up from fifth spot into fourth place on Friday. With such a marked improvement, it is speculated that the team has changed its strategy and is on its way up. Perhaps the boys should cross their legs for the girls. This coming Thursday and Friday, are the Ontario University Ski Championships at Georgian Peaks in Collingwood. The potential for doing well exists for both teams. It is just a matter of putting it all together!!

Victorious weekend as ski team strides ahead

Members of the Queen's X-country ski team excelled at home and away over the weekend.

U. of T., Waterloo and Carleton were the visiting teams at the Queen's University Invitational on Saturday, held at Knowlton Lake. Queen's swept to victory in the 12 km. event as Derek Evans placed first with a time of 54 minutes. Gord Skrecky, Graham Wilkins, Keith Crawford and Peter Ostram took second, third, fourth and fifth places respectively. Many thanks go to Jake Edwards and crew for a well-run event.

On Sunday, part of the team travelled to Ottawa to take part in the 24 km. Maker Loppet event. Keith Crawford won the Senior men's division with a time of 2 hrs. and 4 mins. G. Skrecky, "Gumby" McLellan and G. Wilkins, also of Queen's, placed 2nd, 5th and 6th, respectively. The entire team fared well.

A noticeable absentee from our merry weekend of water skiing was Burger Pete Kopp. Rumour has it that he is having an on-going Big Mac attack and has taken to sleeping at MacDonald's.

Next weekend the team travels to Midland for the O.U.A.A. finals, the last event of the season. The team appears to be in fine form and we wish them the best of luck.

AMS Housing Lottery

Wed. Feb. 16
Doors open 6 - 7 pm

Grant Hall
Draw at 7:15 pm

Rules and Procedures

1. The lottery establishes only a position on the waiting list. The number of units available of any size depends on the number of renewals. There is usually a 50 percent turnover. We will know which apartments and houses will be available on March 1, at which time you will be informed if you have a unit.

2. The lottery is open only to Queen's students who will be registered as full time students for the academic year 1977-1978. Green cards must be presented at the lottery or at the AMS office by 5pm Tues., March 1, if a place on the list is obtained. You don't have to stay for the draw, but it is up to you to find out if your name is selected. A list of those names will be posted on the bulletin board outside the AMS office.

3. Each student is entitled to only one ballot, available at the door, which can be applied to only one type of dwelling unit. It two ballots are found in the same name both will be destroyed. However, if you are applying for a five-man house, for example, all five prospective tenants may apply. Bring your own pencil to sign ballot.

4. An individual whose name is drawn and who chooses to accept the dwelling must be a tenant of the unit, and must have his name on the lease (and be legally bound by the terms of the lease.)

5. Units leased through AMS Housing based on number of single bedrooms.

At Star Games

Track team runs wild in Toronto

The 1977 version of the Toronto-Star Games, held in Maple Leaf Gardens last Friday, proved to be a success for the Queen's track Gals. Highlighting the Gals' performances was that of rookie Sue Spence who smashed the Queen's record for the 1000 yd run by a full 11.9 seconds to finish first in 2:39.3, just ahead of speedy Jane Dick of U.W.O. Sue Plummer placed third, Anne MacMillan was 4th and Beth Buckingham 6th in the mile run.

In the 50 yd. hurdles, both Queen's entrants broke the old Queen's record as Laurin MacWilliams finished in 7.7 sec. and Jean Dietrich in 7.9 sec. A further two records fell as Marj Bousfield ran 600 yd. in 1:34.8 sec. and Jan Pipe breezed to a first place in her heat of the 300 yd dash, and 5th overall, in 38.4 sec. Just 1 second back, Kathy Cook ran a personal best to finish 6th in the same event, then had to push a York runner off the track (for the 2nd time this season) to run her leg of the 4 x 1 lap (160 yd.) relay. Despite this, Queen's finished with a good time of Streamline Sue Spence shows how easy it is to smash a Queen's record and clinch first place in the 1000 yd. run.

1:20.2 in 5th place. Wait till the QU's Gritter, third time lucky!

Although the men's team did not pick up any first, there were many solid performances and good placings. Claus Rinne ran an excellent 2 mile race in 9:06.0 to finish 4th while Vic Gooding was awarded the same place in the 50 yd. dash, although he appeared to cross the finish line 2nd! Continuing his successful comeback, veteran Don Prize was 3rd in the 50 yd. hurdles with a good time of 6.6 sec. Tim Page and Jim Wilson blitzed through 300 yards in 33.5 and 33.7 sec. to place 2nd and 4th respectively. All Queen's entrants finished in the top six in the 600 yd. run as Peter Clarke, Dan Rocheleau, and Jim Clark placed 3rd, 4th and 6th in that order. Walt Sepic was 5th in a strong field running 1000 yards and in a close finish to the mile run, Dale Friesen ended up in 4th place in 4:24.9, with Brian Staggs in 6th.

In the evening international competition, Duncan Card burned 50 yards in 5.4 sec., the same time as that of Steve Williams, the great American sprinter Bob McCormack, in a typical, exciting finish, earned 2nd place in the Canadian invitational mile. A shoving match in the men's 4 x 400 yd relay resulted in disqualification for the U. of T. team and a 2nd place finish for the Gals, represented by Tony "Mad Dog" Verhoeven, Charlie Hitchin, Tim Page and Vic Gooding.

Claus Rinne demonstrated Saturday that recent cold weather has failed to affect his consistent ability to compete well.

3rd time round curling champs

This past Friday and Saturday, the Queen's Women's Curling Team won the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Championships for the third year running. The team of skip Sheryl Keely, third Sue Morrison, second Kathy Keely and lead Judy McDonald, coached by Brian Cox, came through the double elimination competition, held at the Guelph Country Club with a 4 and 1 won-loss record.

Following a defeat of the University of Toronto in the first game, the girls lost to the University of Waterloo. However, they came back to beat the University of Guelph and the University of Waterloo twice to retain the title they first captured in 1975.

Badminton Gals' uphill battle falls short

by Diana Edwards

The women's intercollegiate badminton team finished off their season of play in their usual fine form. They placed a successful second in the OWIAA finals held at Guelph on the weekend. The only regret they had was that they were not able to make up the 7 points needed to catch up with the league-leading Western team. The Queen's team ended with a fine score of 103 matches won throughout the season, while Western had 110 points and 3rd place Toronto netted 95 points.

Top honours were taken by Diana

Edwards as she won the individual title for 1st singles category. Her teammates followed very closely behind. Placing second in their singles play were 2nd ranked Betsy Carey, 3rd ranked Sandy Koerner, 4th singles Gayle Raycraft, 5th singles Bev Koski and 6th singles Lindee Stemp.

All of the girls played extremely well over the season and certainly deserved their fine standings. The two schools who seemed to give the badminton gals the most trouble on the weekend in singles were Western and Guelph but the Golden Gals still managed to win 15 out of 24 singles matches

Some fine teamwork and accurate shots were displayed in the doubles play on the second day of the tournament. Tension was running high since the girls wanted to close the gap in points between themselves and the leading Western team. The second doubles team of Diana Edwards and Gayle Raycraft and 3rd doubles Bev Koski and Lindee Stemp led the play with 3 out of 4 doubles matches won.

Although the 1st doubles team of Betsy Carey and Sandy Koerner played well, it was a case of their opposition having just a fine edge over them. But they had one major triumph—they managed to defeat the strong Toronto 1st doubles team

Once again second place seemed to be a popular standing with the badminton girls. Both the Edwards-Raycraft and the Koski-Stemp teams placed second overall in their OWIAA doubles categories while the team of Carey and Koerner finished in third place.

Coach Bernie Houghton expressed pride and satisfaction at the end of the tournament with his team's 2nd place standing. Many thanks are extended to him by the team for his superb coaching and dedication throughout the year. The team also really appreciates the excellent job done by player-manager Laurel McIntyre and by Martha Nadrozny who practised with the team throughout the season and contributed much towards the cohesive team spirit.

Champs again!

Swimmers hot in pool

Synchronized swimming has once again completed a winning season, bringing back the championship to Queen's for the fifth consecutive season. At the O.W.I.A.A. finals held at York University this Friday and Saturday, Queen's had a solid win with 34.5 total points, 10 points ahead of U. of T. McGill and York tied for third place with sixteen points. There were nine universities competing.

Friday night, Solo Competition was won by Betty Anne Brennan of York, with Laurie Morrison, third and Wendy White, of Queen's placing fourth. Diane Edgerly of Queen's followed closely behind.

Team Competition was highlighted by the Queen's team, swimming to a medley of songs called "Kid Stuff". The winning eight-man team is composed of Diane Edgerly, Erica Geddes, Celeste Jennings, Kathy Lammers, Sandi Landell, Andrea Naemark, Karen Russell and Wendy White. Second place went to Guelph. Saturday morning, in Figures Competition, Queen's placed fifth, sixth, and fourteenth out of 30 competitors. Queen's was represented by Diane Edgerly, Celeste Jennings, and Mary Pullan.

Finally, in Duet Competition, Celeste Jennings and Karen Russell placed a close second with 63.2 points behind Laurie Morrison and Jane Stubington of U. of T. with 65 points. Janet Fix and Mary Pullan, from Queen's placed fourth, swimming a strong duet.

Much appreciation goes to our sub, Jeanne Hughes, who assisted the team in many ways throughout the season, manager Nayda Cole and Coach Madeline Puaelka.

The Synchro Team, Synchro Club, and "guest", Laurie Morrison will be performing Thursday night at 7:00 p.m. Come and see the team that worked so hard to bring back the championship to our University. It's free, come on over to the Queen's pool to see the aquatic arts display with the Gals' diving team and the synchronized swimming team. Thursday, February 17 at 7pm. Everybody welcome to come.

Basketball wrap-up

Good season ends

by Brian Clarke

The 1976-77 Ontario University Athletic Association Basketball League season ended for the Queen's University Golden Gaels Saturday night in Bartlett Gym with the eternal hope which it began with still alive.

When Pete Smith took over the coaching position at Queen's at the start of the season he did it with one aim to give Queen's a winning basketball team once again.

In this light his first year at Queen's can be seen as nothing else but a success. Although the Gaels didn't make the playoffs, he has guided them to their "winningest" season in recent memory (the most comprehensive records show at least five years). It takes time to become No. 1 when you have to move right from the bottom to the top.

The Gaels 5-9 finishing record certainly wasn't sensational, but when it is qualified by several close games against the OUA's best, including Laurentian, Ottawa, and Carleton, and the first victory over York in five years it's quite respectable.

Saturday night in Bartlett Gym the Gaels completed their regular season, losing a close 85-73 contest to Carleton University Ravens.

The Ravens hold down second-place in the eight-team Eastern division and are en route to the playoffs. The Gaels were hoping for an upset but their performance was still well worth any fans trip to the game.

In Bartlett Gym Friday night Queen's dumped the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute Rams 65-53 in its second last game of the season. It too was a game well worth seeing.

Coach Smith certainly deserves to be thanked and congratulated for the wisdom, experience, and enthusiasm he has brought to Queen's. Let's all hope it stays and is contagious.

Thanks is also owing to the Golden Gaels and in particular the four veterans who contributed significantly to the Queen's cause while playing their final year for it.

Foremost of these is Andy Boniwell. Right up until the final two season games he gave it his best. Against Ryerson he netted 11 points, while in the game with Carleton he had the team-high of 21.

Boniwell has also always been a key man under the boards in his four years playing for Queen's. He led the Gaels rebounding in both weekend games, getting nine Friday and eight Saturday.

Queen's other three retiring veterans this year are Henry (Hank) Garbaty, Rob Cooney, and Rob (Max) Smart. All three have been mainstays of the Gaels attack over the past few years.

In Friday's game Garbaty led the Gaels scoring with 15 points, while Smart had four, and Cooney two.

Saturday, Garbaty hooped 18 points, Cooney managed six, and Smart got two.

These four veterans jelled with their team-mates, under the coaching of Smith, both on and off the court in a manner equalled by few Queen's teams in the past.

Coach Smith has understood the rights and sensitivities of each player, and always remained open to suggestion. By his own confidence in the players he has given them confidence in themselves.

There is every reason to believe that the winning ways of Queen's will continue and become more frequent. Coach Smith will be back with a good nucleus of players from this year next season and hopefully a new crop of promising freshman.

Steve (Speedy) McCreedy, Peter Lainey, Mike Flenniken, and Dave

Calnan together with this season's outstanding freshman performers, Kim-Carlton and Steve Simmons should be returning to continue the Gaels march towards OUA supremacy.

To ensure that returning Gaels turn in top shape at the start of next season, coach Smith has met with each player individually and formulated plans for their off-season which will maintain their level of ability and possibly improve it.

Besides the Gaels coming back next year, coach Smith will be working towards improving the standard of high school basketball in Eastern Ontario by holding a coaches clinic in April and a basketball camp for boys in late August. This should provide a worthy source from which Queen's can attract good basketball players in the future.

Gals win in Toronto

by Anne Sisson

The Queen's Golden Gaels had a busy basketball schedule this weekend with three league games but managed to pull through with two wins.

They travelled to Toronto on Friday to play U. of T. but combination of endless turnovers, too many mental errors and terrible refereeing led to a pretty poor game and an extremely tight score with Queen's coming out on top 44-43. Debbie Moore started out her good weekend by pulling down 12 rebounds while Kim Headford was top scorer with 14 points (despite the fact that she only played half the game because of an ankle injury).

On Saturday the Gaels travelled out to York University determined to play up to par. Our defense was much better with quick handed Penny Wedd grabbing 8 steals. Deb Moore repeated her fine performance and came up with great offensive and defensive efforts. Penny Wedd, Donna Roman and Debbie Moore all had double figured scores with 13, 12 and 10 points respectively, contributing to a final score of 61-53 for Queen's.

The Gaels then returned home on Sunday to battle Western, the league leaders in the west division. The Mustang's fast break counteracted anything Queen's managed to do on offense. Other than failing to contain this fast break our defensive efforts were great. We again had three players scoring in the double figures - Kim Headford with 14 points, Donna Roman with 11 and Debbie Moore with 10. Although we were within 5 points of Western with only 5 minutes left in the game, the Mustangs pulled away to a final score of 77-62.

On Tuesday night the Gaels wind up their regular season playing Carleton at home. With a win-loss record of 8-6 Queen's stands third in their league and is pitted against the Waterloo Warriors next Friday in sudden death quarter final action.

by Chris Chenoweth

In today's fast moving world, there are few traditions which last, and still fewer traditions which are built upon pride. Increasingly, money has become the single motivating value for people to work, and this is especially true in the world of sports. Players are breaking contracts, holding out, or simply retiring in an effort to grab more bucks.

But one team in professional sports has spurned this money motive, and has ironically built a tradition of winning which rests upon pride instead. That team is the Montreal Canadiens.

Once again, the Canadiens are in first place in the N.H.L. by a wide margin. No less than eight players made the All Star Team, and there are at least ten Hab farmhands who could be playing in the league right now as first-stringers. The Canadiens have won more Stanley Cups than

Montreal:

CAC's CORNER

Pride in excellence

any other club (17), and seem destined to repeat again this season. Three of the Habs' players - Shutt, Lafleur and Lemaire - are in the top ten in scoring, and Ken Dryden leads in the Vezina goaltending race. Most impressive of all, eight Montreal players have scored at least 15 goals so far, a statistic which exemplifies a consistency any hockey club would love to have.

Despite these perennial successes on the ice, the Canadiens boast one of the lowest aggregate salaries of any team in the N.H.L. Why? Pride in excellence is perhaps the single most important factor. The Habs have employed many of the greatest players in hockey history - stars the likes of Beliveau, Rocket Richard, Doug Harvey, Howie Morenz, and Jacques Plante. The players who replaced the stars of that era seem conscious of trying to live up to the winning tradition which these tremendous athletes exemplified. It can only be this brand of pride which leads Guy Lafleur, the league's leading scorer, to state in a recent Sports Illustrated interview, "I don't want to win the scoring race, as long as WE do". Few Habs speak of their individual talents or feats, instead players talk about the team's play and the chances of winning yet another Stanley Cup. In an age in sports where the individual is number one, this professional modesty or comradeship is both rare and refreshing.

In perhaps the finest example of hockey supremacy, the Montreal Canadiens shellacked another supposed powerhouse, the Boston Bruins, on Saturday by a whopping score of 8-3. Not surprisingly, it was the play of two of the team's lesser stars (Ganney and Lemaire) which led the Canadiens to victory. Throughout the season, the drive of the members of the Habs' second and third lines have won the big games for the team. When proven leaders such as Dryden, Shutt or Lafleur are slumping or injured, Canadiens like Murray Wilson or Mario Tremblay fill in with consistent excellence when called upon. Even the 25th man on the club, Rick Chartraw, is talented enough to be sought after by no less than five N.H.L. clubs in recent trade talks. Indeed, the list of talent and class in the Montreal organization is endless.

In this month's cover story of Sports Illustrated, coach Scotty Bowman explained, "In a way, there is no such thing as real lines anymore (on offence). They just don't last long enough". With the depth and pride in excellence which the Habs exemplify each season, the headline "Les Canadiens sont gagnés une autre Coupe Stanley" seems the only tradition that does last.

Polysar kickbacks

Polysar Ltd., a federal Crown corporation, has admitted paying kickbacks to European buyers of the company's goods, but said that new company policy was to stop this practice. First reports of the kickbacks were printed in the Globe and Mail last November, at which time Polysar denied making any such payments.

Maxwell Henderson, while auditor-general, had checked Polysar's bookkeeping and reported the illegal payments to Prime Minister Trudeau in March 1973. Polysar's Swiss subsidiary was billing customers at inflated prices, and would then give the difference to the customers or their representatives in cash or deposit it in a numbered Swiss bank account.

Mr. Trudeau then had C.M. Drury, President of the Treasury Board investigate the situation. Mr. Drury said that the invoicing system was an acceptable practice in business. John Silver, public relations spokesman for Polysar, said last November that the rebates were "volume discounts" and were not "illicit or illegal".

The reversal of Polysar's stand on the payments came after an investigation of its Swiss subsidiary by two members of the Polysar Board of Directors, John Aylesworth and David Stanley. The two men visited Switzerland, reporting back at the end of January. The Board of Directors accepted their report and decided on the change of policy with regard to kickbacks.

6% inflation

Finance Minister Donald Macdonald said that the government still intends to keep to its target of a six percent inflation rate, despite the bad start caused by a sharp rise in food prices. The rise pushed the consumer price index up nine-tenths of one percent in January. The consumer price index rose by 6.1 percent in the 12 months to January, up from 5.8 percent in the 12 months to December.

Conservative Leader Joe Clark demanded to know why Mr. Macdonald was delaying in bringing down a new budget, and NDP Leader Ed Broadbent asked why the federal government had not instituted a national food policy.

Mr. Macdonald said he would announce the budget date in the next week or two, while Prime Minister Trudeau said he does not anticipate announcing a specific food policy, "but we'll enact policy as it is decided".

Lebanon violence

Fighting continued Friday for the second day in a row as clashes between Palestinian guerrillas and Syrian forces became more violent than they have been since the Lebanese civil war ended three months ago. Syrian soldiers said they were fighting the militant group, The Popular Front, General Command.

Sources said two rival factions of the General Command were split last year between two factions, one led by Capt. Ahmed Jibreel who favoured Syrian intervention, and the other led by Abul Abbas, who supported the rival Iraqi regime.

Gov't openness

The Canadian Bar Association called for new freedom-of-information legislation to allay the growing lack of trust between the people of Canada, and the Government. A. Boyd Ferris, President of the Bar Association, said recent controversies over payments to foreign agents for the sale of nuclear reactors and the so-called blacklist of 21 civil servants "are products of Government secrecy carried too far."

The Government has resisted extensive freedom-of-information laws so far, on the grounds that it would undermine the power of Parliament. The Government says it is answerable to the public through its elected members in the Commons.

Schools object

More than a dozen Toronto secondary schools have refused to participate in Birth Control Week next week the city's department of public health learned yesterday. The department has declined to name the schools involved.

Odds & ends

A salesman, Robert Greer, fell twenty feet down into a dry well while he was trying to make a sale of an accident insurance policy to a North Carolina farmer. He continued his sales pitch while waiting to be rescued. The first ladder the farmer lowered fell apart, and a Rescue Squad finally hauled him out by a rope. After all that, the farmer didn't buy the policy.

Blown-up incident

The team from the parliamentary sub-committee which made a special trip to investigate an incident at Millhaven prison last week has concluded that the inmates' accounts of this incident were exaggerated.

As they found out, only a small amount of tear-gas had been used on the recalcitrant prisoner who had himself only been slightly injured when guards subsequently tried to remove him from his cell.

The use of force by the guards seems justified, since the prisoner in question "bashed-in" one guard's nose rather badly during the scuffle.

KGH staff cuts - danger to patients?

James Flett, executive director of KGH, said last Friday that KGH will look into recent complaints by its nurses and will try to provide better communication between nurses and administrators. Staff members have been writing to the Whig Standard complaining of recent cutbacks (which are a result of the provincial government's restraints). They claim that the workload of the individual nurse is growing increasingly heavy and that there is a real shortage of competent nurses.

Especially concerned seem to be nursing staff working on Connel 9, a 42-patient acute medical floor. Recently, for instance, 2 RNs were left to cover the entire floor for the first two-and-one-half hours of a particular morning shift.

Nurses complain that they are expected to spend more time with VIPs, who get preferential treatment, than with 'ordinary' patients. They also feel that the Medicus program, which requires nurses to write patient reports three times a day, takes up far too much of their time.

One nurse stated that if she were sick, she would rather be treated at Hotel Dieu Hospital than at KGH, because there appears to be much better nursing care at Hotel Dieu.

Mr. Flett, said that in 1975 there were 378 RNs, 119 RNAs, 58 orderlies and 114 "others" working in KGH's nursing department. In 1967 there were 321 RNs, 69 RNAs, 46 orderlies and 156 "others". In 1975 there were 20,634 in-patients compared to 15,295 in 1967. Over that period of

Leaning forward, the Brockington Visitor fields questions from a Grant Hall audience last Monday night.

Materials "all could understand" key to Open U's success - Perry

The Open University "was designed to offer a second chance for higher education to all those who for any reason had been denied or had not taken advantage of the opportunity for higher education after leaving schools".

Sir Walter Perry, Vice-Chancellor of Britain's Open University, said Monday night at the Brockington Lecture, "The primary characteristic of OU students" is staying power. This must be one of the most difficult ways of getting a degree ever invented by the wit of man. Courage and determination that stem from intense motivation are obvious qualities of our graduates.

Sir Walter was outlining four of the changing patterns in higher education. They are: individualized self-paced instruction, contract learning, distance learning and continuing education. The first and third patterns are the basis for operating the Open University.

Individualized self-paced instruction allows the student to move at his or her own pace. "The degree of success (for this type of instruction) depends primarily, I think, upon the quality of the learning materials that are made available to the student; and this quality depends upon the skill, the time and effort, and the cash that are devoted to them," said Perry. He believes that he could "prepare learning materials that would enable virtually all students to comprehend."

The learning materials that have been developed in the Open University for use by the long distance learner may be adopted within the traditional institution of higher education. The reason given by Dr. Perry for this modification is "it seems incontrovertible that we must abandon the notion that a staff-student ratio of 1 to 10 can be sustained, at least for elementary undergraduate courses. The cost is just too high."

British academia sought to set right its lagging pace with most of Europe and North America in making available higher education. Having limited their offerings to such a small percentage of school-leavers, they had a large pool of untapped ability amongst the adult population. To Dr. Perry, "it was patently clear that they could ill afford such a prodigious waste."

The Open University was the principle means used to rectify the situation. Ideally, access to education would be made easy without the necessity of compromising on academic standards. This principle required that there be no qualifications necessary for entry, that costs not prevent the OU from reaching the poor and that the method of study should take education to the student, not take the student to education in the institution.

Students are drawn from all classes and occupations. Dr. Perry thought "that the factor of maturity would be an essential element for success. The loneliness of the long-distance learner is very real and his or her motivation will flag if the learning materials themselves are not stimulating." The materials are the main contact with the university for the isolated student who can't rely on the stimulation, competition or help ordinarily derived from classmates.

He concluded that "the pattern of distance learning is here to stay; but that it is not a panacea, rather an alternative to the traditional pattern."

Damaged reputation, protestors face AMS

Debra Sigler

A motion introduced at the AMS Outer Council meeting to "disapprove of the actions of those students responsible for disrupting the speech of His Excellency Thomas Enders, United States Ambassador to Canada" was put forward by Jamie Avis and Hugh Christie because "such actions damage the reputation of Queens and its students."

Hugh Christie felt the tactics used by those disruptive members of the audience were wrong, and the AMS should not have to act as babysitters. "Unfortunately for them, their cause would have been more widely accepted if it hadn't been couched in the usual paraphernalia of radicalism."

Jamie Avis was motivated to introduce the motion because he was upset by the reception Enders received. He felt Queen's students were usually respectful and since "Enders was invited by the AMS to speak, that's not the kind of action we should be prepared to tolerate. Therefore the AMS ought to take notice and voice its disapproval."

Bill Burgess and Brian Lawson, both of whom were involved in the disruption, felt the motion should be opposed. Lawson pointed out that Enders was invited by the Queen's community but he felt part of that community didn't want him to come. "They were more upset that we made Enders try to deal with the questions rather than the fact he'd killed so many people."

Both Avis and Christie maintained they do not censure the content of the questions, but the tactics used. "It was pretty sensational," Christie commented. "It's not a question of the morals involved in the Cambodian decision, but rather whether the tactics used by the protestors were justified, and I don't think they were."

Moe Chochla, AMS Education Commissioner, pointed out that those who opposed Enders "should have come to the AMS or me and told us that they did not want him."

AMS Commissions filled

MacInerney, Ryder-Burbidge, Doyle & MacMillan-

AMS President-elect Hugh Christie announced his executive's selections for the members of AMS Inner Council last Wednesday night. The new Commissioners are: Cathy MacInerney (Internal Affairs), John Ryder-Burbidge (External Affairs), Mike MacMillan (Education) and Greg Doyle (Campus Activities), QSA Director to be announced. MacInerney's credentials include AMS Page coeditor and AMS High School Liaison Officer. Ryder-Burbidge was previously President of Queen's PC Association. MacMillan has served as Assistant Education Commission, ASUS representative to MAS ASUS Orientation Committee member and was Director of the film "The Academic Cloister". Doyle acted as Chief Returning Officer 1975-76.

Portugal on Journalism

It is hard to break into journalism, students discovered at a "Careers in Journalism" Seminar Tuesday night. Jobs are hard to get but there is a "need for good people. There are too many people that are not up to standard in the profession", said Jean Portugal of MacLean-Hunter.

Portugal disparaged the journalism schools explaining that experience on a paper was more helpful for succeeding in journalism. She said, however, that MacLean-Hunter would not disregard applicants with no experience—they are looking for potential, and the determination to "stick it out."

Portugal saw no real struggle, as a journalist, between her integrity and the need to get a story. The other participant in the seminar, Mark Smyka, editor of the Queen's Page in the Whig Standard, said that he was, however, forced to be aggressive at times.

Student Assistance

by Anne Johnson

In an interview with the Queen's Journal on Tuesday, Dr. Harry Parrott, Ontario Minister of Colleges and Universities, revealed that the Interim Committee on Student Assistance has recently released its report, but that it will not be made available until sometime next week.

It has been noted that there will be significant changes made to the OSAP Program within the next few years. The report of the Interim Committee may very well have influence on these changes.

Parrott added that his department was currently working on the question of student assistance, and that he intended to make it "Priority One" in the department. Parrott noted that a full Ministry response to the report would not be forthcoming "for a while" since he had to take into account "all the ramifications of those recommendations on Government policy as a whole."

In late 1975, the McKeough-Henderson Report made recommendations to either reduce or completely cut out the grant portion of OSAP. The Government deferred response to these recommendations until it had considered the report of the Interim Committee.

If you guessed such standbys as Reader's Digest or Time or the Ladies Home Journal, you're way off.

The latest figures from the Audit Bureau of Circulation show that TV Guide — selling more than 12 million copies a week — is the publication with the largest circulation in the U.S.

In second place, with a circulation of 8.4 million magazines, is Family Circle, followed by Woman's Day, The National Enquirer and Penthouse. Playboy is in sixth place.

Reader's Digest, once the all-time leader, doesn't even rank in the top 10 any more, and has finished in 11th place. Hustler magazine, a newcomer in the 10th spot, has nudged ahead of Reader's Digest.

10 Campuses out Feb. 9-10

Students boycott to protest Ont. fee hike

OTTAWA (CUP)—Students at ten Ontario campuses boycotted classes Feb. 10 to protest province-wide tuition fee hikes of $100 for universities and $75 for the 22 colleges of applied arts and technology.

Details were sketchy at press time, but according to reports from the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS), the following campuses were boycotting classes Feb. 9 and 10: the colleges of Humber, Fanshawe and Niagara; the universities of McMaster, Lakehead, Carleton, Windsor, Toronto, Laurentian, York and Brock.

At Laurentian, classes were shut down and about 40 students were picketing the university entrances. University support staff and city bus drivers were not crossing the line, according to OFS staff member Rick Gregory.

In St. Catharines, Brock University and Niagara College students met together in a mass rally on the Brock campus.

At Carleton, 300 students assembled and heard student president Scott Mullin argue for a redistribution of the taxation system. "If all taxpayers pay, all qualified persons should be able to attend (a post-secondary institution)."

Student union vice-president and National Union of Students (NUS) president Riel Miller followed this up with a call for full public funding of post-secondary education "instead of private corporation investments financed by tax breaks."

NUS executive-secretary Dan O'Connor told the students that "if we sit back and do nothing, nobody else will move first." He said student protests in Alberta and New Brunswick "originally appeared futile" but were effective in influencing future government decisions.

Carleton president Michael Oliver said he agreed with "a transfer of payment from lower to higher income groups" and that he supported the abolition of tuition, but since "neither is feasible, the only option is raise tuition to the point which is necessary, and balance it with a loan structure in order to aid low income groups."

The boycott of classes strategy was set at a special OFS-sponsored meeting of student leaders in mid-January, as part of their campaign to express opposition to the tuition hikes announced by the government last November and set for the 1977-78 academic year.

The hikes will bring university fees to about $700 per year and college fees to $325.

The Federation and individual student unions are also engaged in a publicity campaign aimed at community groups, politicians and the media, according to the strategy laid down at mid-January meeting.

Also in the works are the formation of local "election preparedness committees" whereby students are to canvas politicians to find out where they stand on the tuition issue.

Student leaders oppose the hike on the grounds that tuition acts as a financial barrier to low-income students, and says the hike, and government statements that tuition fees may rise in future years, is an indication that the Henderson Report is being implemented.

The report on special program spending, compiled under the direction of former auditor-general Maxwell Henderson, and released in late 1975, advocated tuition fee increases of 65 percent to make up for government funding cutbacks for government funding cutbacks for the next couple of years.

According to Christie, a general meeting at Queen's was scheduled for February 8, but due to a lack of publicity, the meeting was not held. The meeting was intended to formulate a strategy for the portrayal of Queen's displeasure at the tuition increase. Four articles were written and published in the Journal outlining the issue and OFS recommendations.

However, Christie felt the main reason for the failure of any form of protest was simply that, "the issue was not of a high enough profile on Queen's Campus to warrant a mass boycott." Christie made extensive tours of the residences outlining the issue and reported that the response was one of acceptance. "People are looking at the $100 increase over five years. That is not necessarily a bad thing. It's more likely to be a series of small increases over the next couple

T.O.'s growth needs to slow says Cassidy

Toronto has grown since the war at the expense of other parts of Ontario and the trend should be reversed, said Michael Cassidy, NDP Housing Critic of the Ontario Legislature.

As the result of this unbalanced development Toronto is now confronting housing, transportation and housing problems, and with the diminishing natural resources of Ontario, there is a need for a reorientation of growth to the less populated areas, explained Cassidy to students of the School of Urban and Regional Planning, Tuesday afternoon.

Since economic growth is slowing in Ontario and the principle economic forces are shifting to the West, Cassidy said the NDP is examining development programs with a view to curbing the growth of Toronto.

Toronto's growth is a result of young people streaming in with the hope of finding good jobs, but, in order to stop the flow, ways must be found to create jobs outside Toronto, he said.

Course for staff

A number of resource people from the University and the community have agreed to participate in workshops and programs for Queen's support staff as part of the University's winter training program.

"Making the Most of Opportunities", a day-long seminar for secretarial staff will be held February 28. Then in March, Principal Ronald Watts and Dr. Duncan Sinclair, Dean of Arts and Science, will address administrative staff in a two-part program called "The State of the University."

The program for secretaries begins with a discussion led by Flora MacDonald, M.P. for Kingston and the Islands.

The lunchtime panel discussion on "Working Women at Queen's" will feature four staff members: Margaret Clark, Administrative Assistant, Douglas Library; Jill Harris, Assistant to the Secretary of the Senate; Wilma Bernabei, Senior Systems Analyst, University Information Systems; and Rene Hogarth, Administrative Assistant, Department of Political Studies.

In the afternoon, Professor Marion Meyer of the Department of Sociology will discuss "Some hangups of the multiple career women: mother, wife and professional."

Canada Campus Notes

Tactics against fee hikes

VANCOUVER [CUP]— Student leaders at the University of British Columbia have proposed a September tuition fee boycott if fees are hiked more than 10 per cent.

Undergraduate society presidents and two student representatives to the board of governors agreed to stage the boycott if three conditions are met:

- fees must not increase more than 10 per cent
- UBC's governing board urge the provincial government to increase student loan funds by 10 per cent and
- the board must actively seek non-government sources of funding.

The February provincial budget increased education spending by 11.5 per cent — considerably less than the universities requested. As a result, university presidents at UBC and University of Victoria have said 25 per cent tuition increases will be necessary to maintain academic standards.

The UBC board of governors is expected to make a final decision on fees at its March meeting.

The proposal adopted by student leaders was based on a six-page proposal drafted by student president Dave Theesen, arts representative Paul Sandhu and student board members Moe Sihota and Basil Peters.

The report points out that a tuition hike will be coupled with residence hikes, residence food price increases and cafeteria price rises and increased textbook costs. It notes that transportation costs have recently gone up 40 per cent and that Vancouver has one of the highest cost-of-living rates in the country.

"Although students will be faced with higher educational costs, their ability to pay these costs has not and will not increase substantially," the report says.

It said recent surveys by UBC student services show that only 20 per cent of male students and seven per cent of female students could be expected to fully finance their school year from summer savings.

"It is our impression that with all these increases in students educational costs, coupled with bleak summer employment picture, that education will become less and less accessible, especially for those from an economically deprived background. It is also our belief... that education must remain accessible to all."

The proposal also suggests the university eliminate expenditures through cutbacks of superfluous faculty and staff, campus maintenance reductions, elimination of campus patrol and suggests the university seek alternative funding from industry.

It concludes by urging student leaders to consider the September tuition boycott and suggests the student council spend an additional $6,725 to organize the action.

Deadlines extended

OTTAWA [CUP]— Manpower and immigration minister Bud Cullen announced Feb. 8 extensions for applications for the Young Canada Works and the Canada Works programs.

Applications postmarked before midnight Feb. 18 will be considered for Young Canada Works. The press release announcement also stated that "all applications for the Canada Works program received by the department this week would be considered."

The department reported that they had received applications totalling about $272 million for an allocation of $60 million for Canada Works. Applications amounting to $64 million were received for an allocation of $26 million for Young Canada Works.

On Feb. 7 Matt Graham, an official in the minister's office in charge of job creation programs, including Young Canada Works, stated that the deadline would not be extended except in cases where weather conditions and other difficulties made it impossible for the applications to be received in time for the original Feb. 4 deadline.

Test too difficult

OTTAWA [CUP]— After taking an English literacy test of the type administered to first-year university students, thirty University of Western Ontario professors concluded it was too difficult.

Almost 50 per cent of the first-year students who took a similar test last fall under the auspices of the Council of Ontario Universities (COU) were considered as requiring remedial help. Forty-six per cent of 6,000 students failed the test.

But many of the professors, who along with other sectors of the community considered "educated" volunteered to take the test recently, argued that it was no measure of literacy.

According to one professor, "When I saw the results of the test given to the freshmen students, I was shocked that literacy standards have declined so much. But when I saw the type of questions that are supposed to measure literacy, I changed my mind. I don't think this type of multiple-choice test really tells you anything."

And Robert Bailey, head of a high school English teachers' association in Toronto, said, "The instructions are very complicated at times. Some of the questions seem to be trying to trick people rather than test them. We need more evidence than this to suggest the students are illiterate."

Journal interview with Kingston's Federal and Provincial Parliamentarians (part 1)

Flora Macdonald, MP and Keith Norton, MPP

by Terry Collins and Giles Gherson

The Journal recently interviewed Flora Macdonald, MP for Kingston and the Islands, and Keith Norton, MPP for the same riding, and recently-appointed Ontario Minister for Community and Social Services.

Gunder-Frank

With regard to the Government's refusal to admit into Canada development theorist Andre Gunder-Frank, scheduled to speak at a conference at Queen's in March, Flora Macdonald cited the reason given by Immigration Minister in Ottawa, Bud Cullen: Gunder-Frank was inadmissible for reasons of "national security." Although she had done her best to have a member of the Privy Council review the file to confirm this opinion, "You can't force a Minister to reveal a file when it's marked confidential," she said.

It is for this reason that Miss Macdonald cited the principle of the affair as the real issue at hand. Not only have the representations made by various sectors of the queen's community been ineffectual but even if they had achieved their goal, the broad problem would still exist, she maintained. Thus she pondered the utility of expending a considerable amount of energy in an attempt to resolve one particular case; the University community might prefer to put its support behind "legislation...which (might) terminate abuses" of Government power.

In this connection, she noted that a Private Member's Bill, calling for the institution of greater freedom of information had reached the committee stage.

While Miss Macdonald envisaged the passage of the freedom of information act as a practical attempt to come to terms with the board principle raised by the Gunder-Frank and Government blacklist issues, she conceded that the bill would probably not cover "cases which, if revealed, would have an adverse effect on National Security." Given this restriction, the possibility of abuse persists, she said.

Norton's Ministry

High on Keith Norton's priority list as newly-appointed Minister for Community and Social Services is a recommendation that "now is the time" for the rates of income maintenance to be increased. That some income maintenance rates have not been augmented for 15 months has "created a real problem for a lot of people who are dependent on them," Norton contended.

Although Norton expressed an ambition to take "certain new directions," he noted that his options with regards change were somewhat limited owing to the high costs involved. Observing that, "We will have almost no capital in our budget", his ability to develop new programmes was severely constrained, he said.

At the moment, Norton is engaged in "housecleaning", including the review of certain current programmes as well as the department's budget. He also referred to the "myriad of confusing regulations and definitions that exist" under the various programmes, with which he is attempting to come to grips.

Norton judged his Ministry to be "in pretty good shape", the difficult economic situation notwithstanding.

He suggested that much of the criticism directed toward his predecessor, Mr. Taylor, has overlooked the fact that Taylor was faced with governing a department the services of which have been subject to an ever escalating demand, yet during an era of severe financial constraints. Mr. Taylor was, therefore, forced to establish priorities on the basis of limited resources — a situation which was dictated "by the reality of the economic situation". Norton pointed out that he faces much the same situation as Mr. Taylor had to deal with, but allowed that "different personalities express what it is they're attempting to achieve differently" and therefore elicit different responses — thereby implying that public reaction to Mr. Taylor could to some degree be accounted for by "the way he expressed things".

Differential fees

In justifying the Government's policy of differential tuition fees for foreign students, Norton implied that the chief objective was to ensure that students from affluent countries paid a greater share of the cost of their people from the United States" — not to mention wealthy students from less prosperous countries.

Norton suggested that while Ontario had a responsibility to engage in foreign assistance in the area of post-secondary education, such aid might be more fruitful if it were to be specifically allotted "to students who need it most."

In his view, this aid would "more reasonably be funded through the Federal Government." Norton was adamant that whatever the new Government policy might be, it ought not to "destroy the international mix at our universities, which is vitally important."

In contrast to her provincial counterpart, Flora Macdonald declared herself unable "to support the concept of differential fees."

Miss Macdonald appealed to our sense of history. In the past, Canadian universities had few facilities for students beyond the undergraduate level. Canadian universities have subsequently developed, particularly at the post-graduate level, only because "for a long period of time we accepted a certain kind of foreign aid: the ability to enter university in other (developed) countries".

She argued that Canada ought not now shirk its present responsibility to nations which find themselves in our predicament of 20 years ago. The Canadian need in the past was on a national scale, she maintained, and by the same token, the Canadian responsibility of today should be undertaken by the Federal Government.

She has not ruled out the possibility of Federal-Provincial co-operation on this matter.

Miss Macdonald and Mr. Norton offer their insights on Confederation in the next edition of the Queen's Journal.

editorial opinion

A lack of perspective

The AMS leaders have failed to come to terms with fundamental issues of human values. It seems highly inappropriate that President-elect Christie and President Avis have sponsored a motion at Outer Council to disapprove of "those students" responsible for disrupting the speech made by US Ambassador Thomas Enders at Queen's last week.

There were very serious points to be raised with the Ambassador regarding his intimate involvement in the massive slaughter of Cambodian civilians in 1973. Those in attendance in Dunning Auditorium were justified in expecting Mr. Enders to address those events brought up about his past. These issues are too serious to escape discussion. It is ludicrous to think, as many people throughout the University would seem to, that Enders was right in keeping solely to the topic of his speech, "Canada-US Relations". Undoubtedly the Cambodia issues could have been raised in a more reasonable and effective manner than that chosen by "those students" but their distasteful demonstration is not nearly as important a matter than that which they were raising about Mr. Enders.

Surely one displays a profound lack of perspective when one becomes exercised about rudeness to a man who may legitimately be considered a mass murderer. What is normally a legitimate concern with propriety and respect for guests of the university must, because of the severity of the issues involved in Mr. Enders background, be put aside.

We might well reflect on the change of attitude here in North America regarding individual responsibility in state crimes. With confidence and occasional self-righteousness the previous generation tried the Germans and Japanese leaders for war crimes. Perhaps whatever emotions were justifiable at that time, in the prosecution of defeated authoritarian regimes, were resurrected by the demonstrators during Mr. Enders speech. Rude and overbearing they may have been, the protestors' message was powerful and necessary.

Enders promoted Canadian nationalism

By Mike Stunden

Through a series of national and international events, most Canadians have accepted the topic of Canada's future as worthy of discussion at the supper table. My own awareness of the Canada question has, during the winter of 76-77, been greatly enhanced by a number of fortuitous events.

I was lucky enough to enroll in a Canadian-American relations history course where scarcely a class goes by without a learned exhortation from the pulpit to "examine your position; see where you stand." Ski trips to Vermont have brought me into contact with elitist American feelings on the "Quebec problem", and my evening arrangements with a mixed bag of economists, sociologists, mathematicians, and hard-headed engineers have provided a lively forum for views on the subject.

Seeing Thomas Enders and his diplomatic dance routine on Tuesday the 8th was like attending a large discussion group for which there had been many months of preparation. It was by far one of the most enjoyable lectures I have attended at Queen's; I left with a feeling of intellectual and emotional contentment.

In an intellectual sort of way I was happy to see the actual expression, in the guise of comments from the audience, of many of the themes that continually surface in an examination of Canadian history. One of the questions raised was, "How can we be equal partners when one of the strongest justifications for Canada's existence has always been fear of the U.S.?"

The glaring contrast between Enders' denial of official American interest in Canadian policy and the remarks of those in the audience who strained to establish that Manifest Destiny was, indeed not dead, but only hidden in such organs as the CIA, merely emphasized the need that Canadians still have to view the U.S. in a negative way. Why we need this image cannot be explained here but to the keen observer on Tuesday night, it was clear that it still retains much of the power that it traditionally has held.

CANADIAN NATIONALISM

My emotional contentment resulted from what I believe I saw, in the discussion of Tuesday night, concerning the nature of Canadian nationalism. In the search for the characteristics of Canadian nationalism, many are drawn to reflect upon our two founding cultures, the vanities of people that lend character to the country, our art works, etc. But there is one characteristic that many of us possess that is all too often overlooked or in some instances is seen as a negative point. This peculiarity was evident on Tuesday night. I am referring to the confidence in our toleration and the resulting aptitude for rational discussion. That so many people fail to recognize this virtue is due mainly to it being labelled as dullness.

"Dullness" in Canada is at an all-time high during the winter. Unlike the summer, which is a time for escape, winter forces people to remain together for long periods of time. Problems must be confronted in this environment by discussion and some sort of common assent.

If there ever was a winter, in recent history, that has served to insulate the people, it is this one with its masses of snow. The problem of Quebec heights and accentuates this mood that I have ascribed to the Canadian winter. The controversy that has been with us for hundreds of years has now grown large all of a sudden. The way that the question is being dealt with is through the knowledge of our being able to work problems out peacefully. Flashes of this mentality were apparent at the Enders' lecture.

The question of force came up in the context of Canada's dealings with Quebec and the United States' dealings with Canada. The fact that Enders dismissed these notions as slightly comical shows that he has a good grasp of Can-Am relations and Canada itself. That Canada is basically a non-violent country cannot be avoided. A columnist in the New York Times wrote that in the U.S.S.R. Levesque's separatist stand would be treated as treason. He could not understand our complacency in the face of the issue. Is it the mark of an adolescent nation to respond as we do? I think not. It is ascribable to the peculiar Canadian psyche which can be discovered if one looks hard enough.

Take notes on Open U

Our thanks to Brockington Visitor Sir Walter Perry. There were a number of noteworthy characteristics of Britain's Open University brought out during his five day visit. The Open University provides a flexible and individualized adjunct to the traditional university system. It is intended for highly motivated and mature students and is a prominent vehicle for social mobility. The Open University accommodates those who may never have had the opportunity or interest to pursue a traditional university education.

Given the uncertain prospects for post-secondary education here in Canada we would do well to watch the development of the British system. TV lectures may be in our own near future.

P.C. column by Rob Welch

FORMER TORY LEADER:

Stanfield continues to help

This is a tough column to write, because this writer knows that it appears in a Journal which few people will read. It is the start of the great "Reading Week Trek", and reading the Journal today is not such a great priority. Packing, trying to get through on the phone to the taxi companies, lining up for the bus or the train, are much more important.

But, besides being the start of Reading Week, this day has some significance. It was one year ago today that Tories from all across Canada came together in Ottawa to choose a new leader. Three days later, on February 21, 1976, Joe Clark emerged as the winner.

The man Mr. Clark succeeded, Robert Stanfield, has just finished giving a couple of lectures in Nova Scotia, the notes of which were published in the Globe and Mail last week. After reading them, the present writer cannot help but remark on the brilliance of the man. The lectures contain statements that show a tremendous insight into public affairs in Canada, for example into why it is increasingly difficult for parliament to hold the government accountable, into how a rigid form of centralized federalism has not merely caused Canadians in Quebec, but Canadians in other provinces, to question the value of Confederation as it functions now. Mr. Stanfield makes a strong argument on behalf of the continued existence of national political parties as consensus-building institutions. He asserts that in the next couple of years Canada will need all the consensus it can get.

It is much easier to point out problems than it is to offer solutions, and solutions are harder to find in the lectures, but Mr. Stanfield's analysis of Canada's present political situation is uniquely perceptive. The Prime Minister is an intelligent man, but this writer does not think that even Mr. Trudeau, at his philosophic best, could match Mr. Stanfield's lectures last week.

While it is always risky to criticize a decision of the electorate, it will always be regretted by this writer that Mr. Stanfield has never become Prime Minister, not because of the fact that he is a Tory, but because of the feeling this writer has that Mr. Stanfield is a better man for the job than the present occupant of 24 Sussex Drive. Mr. Trudeau preaches a sermon of rigid federalism, and tries to sweeten this message for French Canadians with a bilingualism program. Mr. Stanfield, a former provincial premier himself, talks about flexibility in Confederation, while supporting the Official Languages Act. For the country's sake, especially in view of the evaluation of federalism which is going on now, it is hoped that Mr. Stanfield will not fade into the background. He will continue to help Canada even if he just continues to speak out about the country's problems, as he did last week at Acadia University.

Cassidy's talk stressed provinces' complaints

by Heather Lang, NDP Columnist

The Kingston and the Islands NDP, in conjunction with the Queen's New Democrats, held their general meeting at Princess Street United Church on Tuesday, February 15 at 8:00 p.m. Elections for the Kingston NDP executive membership for the year to come were held. The Queen's New Democrats have good representation with the elections of John Campey for Publicity and Sue Breaux for Organizer. Following the election, Mr. Michael Cassidy, the guest speaker of the evening, presented his "musings" on the present economic and political situation in Canada. Mr. Cassidy, MPP for Ottawa Centre, had been, Housing Critic for the past four years. Due to this week's NDP shuffle, he is now Treasury Critic.

Although Mr. Cassidy stressed that he had no firm answers about what should be done in Canada and that he was speaking as a member of the NDP rather than stating the Party's opinions, Mr. Cassidy did put forward some definite suggestions. He dealt principally with provincial dissatisfactions such as the bilingual-separatist problem in Quebec, Francophones in Ontario, Saskatchewan's fight for cable television, the problem of unemployment, urban industrialization, and the decline of manufacturing across Canada. "Every province has got dissatisfactions with the federal government," he said.

Mr. Cassidy felt that it is more important to examine how the provinces can work together, rather than talk about constitutional issues. The provinces, he stated, should be granted greater participation in affairs within their own boundaries. Mr. Cassidy also stressed the need for more personal contact with people in other provinces. He said, "We have too little of these kinds of contacts." A valuable type of contact, Mr. Cassidy felt, would be between the Queen's New Democrats and students attending other universities, particularly in Quebec.

Mr. Cassidy was well-received by the audience. During the day he met with the School of Urban and Regional Planning at Queen's University and Queen's New Democrats at a pot-luck dinner.

Peripheral Visions by David Gay

A Canadian Success

This will be the final term of university education for many students. It is an anxious time for those who must embrace the cruel world of their own free will. Others are pushed out of the nest after being rejected from graduate programs or being notified that their LSAT scores are lower than that of a penguin who wrote the LSAT under controlled, experimental conditions.

Students in the professional schools of law and medicine will advance another step in the monotonous sequence of their apprenticeship by interning or arduing (I find it amusing that in 2000 years archaeologists will dig up video-tapes of our TV soap operas and conclude that 95 percent of population were either doctors or lawyers.)

On the other hand you may be finishing a BA. This means you are in more wide-open field and can begin life by demanding urinalysis and saliva tests on the LSAT control penguin. Then there are engineers and commerce students who definitely have a job to do, the only question is for whom? During the school year, different corporations and teams of executives to the campus to reap the harvest of young talent.

One engineer I know is only an average student, but was convinced at a personal interview would secure the job he always wanted: major executive with Maplenixon Oil. The company wouldn't have to fill over a typewritten application form - he would dazzle them in the job. Assured of his sparkle and charm, he knew the hiring would be more than a business transaction - it would be a marriage of spirits.

"Oh sure," he told the Maplenixon representative. "I've been thinking of going out west for three summers now, and I know which end of a shovel is which. Furthermore, I believe a human approach is necessary in dealing with people. Being a white collar executive won't do me from identifying with labour and with its wives and children."

This fellow was escorted out the door while pleading an attack of general conservatism. He screamed that he didn't really mean what he said, or any of it if necessary. I know of two other candidates, a musician and a geologist, who were equally unsuccessful with Maplenixon. Both received letters letting them to inform them that there is currently no room for persons of their calibre. Both have accepted scholarships to Oxford and Cambridge instead. They had no other choice because the real world did not want them. This caused me to wonder what exactly the real world was, until I learned that my friend Max had landed a job with Maplenixon.

Now Max is only a mediocre art student, barely passing in his first year. Any time he has left over from studying is not spent in the library but on the long distance telephone. For years he has been trying to convince his parents in Ohio that there are no igloos in Kingston.

Somewhat curious, I grabbed one of the Maplenixon oil executives by the carnation and demanded to know why Max had been hired.

"He is a good man in a seminar", the executive informed me. "We at Maplenixon agree that he does no research or homework. But in a seminar he has a way of making you believe that what he says is what you are supposed to have, desire and-or believe in, and that's the sort of man we need on the Maplenixon team."

"Let me be candid," he continued, shutting off his concealed tape recorder. Max's tongue is a combination lasse and razor blade that can hog tie any professor and back defenceless girls into corners. The truth is that being an oil executive has nothing whatsoever to do with oil and natural resources. The company board room and the House of Commons are really just big seminar rooms. We drew up a contract as soon as Max's seminar opponent burst into tears."

I have tried to forget all this but I am continually reminded of it through the courtesy of Hockey Night in Canada. During the games I get to watch Maplenixon oil commercials ("Excuse us Mrs. Jones but a lot went into bringing that roast, dead beaver to your family's table and we at Maplenixon played no small role. Each year our oil slicks trap thousands of..."). I get to watch Max, now an honorary PhD in Geology, strut around in his new Pierre Cardin lab coat. He expresses the need for a human approach to the problems of the north. He confesses that he loves working with our native people. Whenever I believe him I look up "exorcist" in the yellow pages.

Perhaps Max and the friendly folks at Maplenixon oil are living proof of the psychologist's theory that history is a manifestation of the subconscious. Let me explain. Like the rest of us, the Maplenixon team secretly believe that they invested sex and are now ravishing our virgin northern hinterland, pretending that it is a "harsh and cruel mistress" meant for human hands. Like the rest of us they secretly believe that Our's is the last generation of mankind. Unfortunately, they are in a position to do something about it: deplete our natural resources. The criminals we call big businessmen consider resources secondary to profits and corporations anyways, (i.e. some poor slob invents the lightbulb and you get General Electric. Someone else invents the hamburger and you get Ronald McDonald who may well be the anti-christ).

But for all this I sincerely believe Max when he says that Maplenixon cares about our environment. They ought to - they have a fortune invested in it.

"Once you've programmed one of these little fellows, you know it will always share your basic assumptions. That's more than you can say for the students - not that we aren't working on that too."

Second-year nurses: realize dynamic role in health-care system

After resolving the many emotional and academic problems associated with any first-year program at a university, (such as nursing science) one generally proceeds to second year and its challenging frontiers. Our theoretical background is strengthened with anatomy, under the tutelage of a dynamic, energetic anatomist whose creativity never ceases to amaze us. Physiology and developmental psychology are also required courses giving us a good background for the nursing courses which follow in third year.

The second-year nursing course focuses on community health. We visit a family, which in most cases is able to provide us with a first-hand experience of normative family behaviour and health status. We begin to assume the "health teaching" role, supplying the families with health information related to their needs. The competent referral of problems to the appropriate agency is a skill which we also begin to acquire.

Geriatrics and chronic care are covered at St. Mary's, whereas at KGH we are concerned with acute care. Assessment skills are practiced in these settings as well as extending previously-mastered nursing skills.

Work at the Clinical Learning Centre, allows us to acquire clinical assessment skills. These skills, previously belonging only in the physician's realm, are being incorporated into our curriculum as a result of the government's encouragement to diversify the nurses' role. An example of this diversification is the "nurse practitioner." Oshawa is a hospital for handicapped children where rehabilitation and pediatric experience are provided. Clinical conferences involving physicians, nurses, physio and occupational therapists, allow us to see the health care team in action.

Fraser Armstrong Centre, a clinic for ambulatory patients, is again an experience in health team interaction and the benefits of the health care system to the patient. We follow the procedures in a specialty clinic, watching the assessment skills in use and the follow-up care the client receives.

These experiences provide us with a background in the functioning of the health-care system and our roles in it. Through it, one comes to realize how dynamic a nurses' role can be.

Was McLaughlin a concert?

When did we last have a real concert?

Dear Editor:

When was the last time you went to a concert? When was the last time we had one? A very fine question indeed. To tell you the truth it was about two years ago when the Strawbs came to town. You see it's been that long since a band of any greater than provincial renown seems to have visited this Campus. (April Wine and Flush don't even come close).

The point of concern being that we, 10,000 students are paying $3 each a year to see... what?

Murray McLaughlin? Granted, the man is one of the biggest names in Toronto, but how many times do we have to see the same performers? (few as they are).

I heartily endorse the idea of going South to pick up talent...but I'm getting a little sick of seeing another faceless guitar picker sitting on a stool when I could see comparable talent at Bitter Grounds—and in a far more comfortable setting. At least at Bitter Grounds I can sit on a seat instead of the floor of an arena.

I'm not bemoaning my lost $3.00, but rather my lost opportunities to see bands such as Renaissance, Phoebe Snow, Al Stewart, Harmonium Supertramp, Van Morrison and any others who were on tour in this area (Toronto and or Montreal), in the past few months. I hope that the new executive will show more concern in this area than the past group has, and take a more serious stand on our behalf. I hope the remainder of this year's Concerts budget will be spent on acquiring a good band, rather than one cheap (49c) blowout to get rid of the extra money, and I hope that it will be held while the majority of students are still on Campus (not like Santana-Peter Frampton for summer students of '75).

"AMS is not a bad publisher"

Dear Editor:

I was not surprised to read your recent editorial in which you criticized my salary report. However I feel that in some instances you oversimplified the issues involved to such an extent that it is impossible to consider my report fairly.

For example you say that I recommended that the Journal editor should be responsible to the student government. This is not true. The Journal editor is selected by the staff of the paper and can only be removed through a Campus-wide referendum. Under these conditions, which I support, the editor will always be more or less independent of the A.M.S. and certainly independent of its executive officers. What I did suggest was that the editor, if he is being paid a salary, should report to the Vice-President (Operations). Reporting to the Vice-President is very different from being responsible to him.

To suggest, as you did, that appearance of the paper on a semi-weekly basis means that the editor is living up to his salaried responsibilities is to totally ignore the comprehensive program that the present editor put forward to the Board of Directors last spring. It is like saying that so long as the pub is open six nights a week everything that needs to be done is being done.

The Journal did concede that the A.M.S. was the Publisher of the paper. You further defined the A.M.S. as the student body and no one would dispute this. But why didn't you go one step further and point out that the duly elected representatives of the Society use the A.M.S. Executive and Outer Council? It is entirely legitimate for these people to act on behalf of the Society and this includes acting on behalf of the Society in matters of publishing a student paper. What is really required is a definition of the word publisher. I defined this rather conventionally, I thought.

I believe that it would likely be best for the Journal to incorporate on its own and to be governed in its financial affairs by its own Board of Directors. It would only be a matter of time before the editors of the paper suspected their own Board, who of necessity would be isolated from the actual production and content of the paper, of having self-serving interests in the same sense that the A.M.S. is presently suspect. The Journal's argument is not with the A.M.S. It is with the whole concept of a publisher. I submit that the A.M.S. is not a bad publisher and that it is certainly no worse than any publisher the Journal could conjure up on its own.

In concluding I would like to make one last comment, this time on the title of the editorial "A subversive press?" I hope the irony of this title was not lost on the Journal editorial staff. A few weeks ago the Journal informed us of the new CUP guidelines for reporting the news. The Journal is very concerned that the A.M.S. might use its publisher's position to force a particular point of view on the paper but at the same time it is willing to pay CUP $3600.00 a year to have them foist one point of view on the Journal. I challenge the Journal to point out an instance when the A.M.S. has manipulated editorial policy and if we did to prove that we charged you $3600.00 for the privilege.

CUP: PRINCIPLES VERSUS ETHICS

Dear Editor:

We agree wholeheartedly with the Journal's position as member under protest of CUP. A news service has no business committing itself to a political persuasion of any description, whether explicitly or implicitly. The news service is a clearing-house for articles published in member papers across the country. If these articles reflect political positions that is fine. The political orientations of the editors of CUP's member papers are as varied as those of the society at large. This should be reflected in the news packages that CUP sends to its members. A news service should not edit articles in such a way that their original meaning has been distorted.

To say that CUP's admitted commitment to social change and the elimination of elite groups in society is honest is like a thief admitting that he makes his living by stealing. He is being honest, but that does not mean that he is doing the right thing. Objectivity is a goal which is not often realized but which must be strived for in a news story.

As the Journal reported (Jan. 13), the news service has pledged itself to "encourage change in the leadership and/or structure of student organizations where they fail to recognize their responsibility to mobilize students, to assist in the mobilization of students against the capitalist economic system where it is found to be preserving the class structure or oppressive to women, native peoples or other minorities." Who is going to decide when the student organizations really believe that it is their responsibility to mobilize against the capitalist system?

At the same time as CUP is expounding the principles of its news service, its code of ethics states that, "student journalists should strive continually to be fair and accurate in their reports..." To be "fair and accurate" in a report, an issue should be approached from many angles, not simply from the point of one wishing to change society. It seems that CUP's statement of principles and its code of ethics are incompatible.

The avowed commitment of CUP to social change places the credibility of the service in jeopardy. Any articles sent to its member papers will be edited with this specific bias in mind. Thus the papers receiving these articles will never know whether or not they reflect the views of their original authors or the papers which first published them.

CUP will continue its 39th Conference in March. Let us hope that the delegates take a good hard look at the principles and employees of the news service. CUP could be an extremely valuable forum for the exchange of news and ideas. However, if the Journal cannot trust CUP to accurately relay information, why should it pay close to $6,000 (next year) to belong to it?

Queen's: A selfish (racist)?

Dear Editor:

The President of the AMS is "not surprised" that the students at this University voted in favour of differential fees for foreign students. The President-elect tells us that Queen's is "not conservative." We think they both have missed the boat.

The results of this referendum shows that most of the wealthy students of Queen's are unwilling to share their resources and University facilities with foreign students. In a majority of cases foreign students do not have the chance to get as good an education where they come from due to poor facilities or lack of wealth. Of 10,000 students at Queen's approximately 1,000 are foreign students and any difference in tuition fees is not going to make much of a difference to a University as wealthy as Queen's.

The results of this referendum shows one thing: that most Queen's students are selfish, self-centered and possibly even racist. But not all of them; the 70 per cent of the students, that didn't vote, just don't care.

As well it would be a delight to have an AMS President with enough "balls" to say that he "is surprised" that Queen's students are this selfish. Let's face it, this referendum result, whether it means that Queen's students are conservative or whatever, means above all that there is a sickness loose! Sooner or later Queen's students are going to have to learn to share the land and, kids, you may as well start right now!

Interview with Sir Walter Perry

O. U. not an Alternative to University

One of the 21,000 graduates of Britain's Open University completed his degree while at sea on his deep-sea trawler; another qualified for her B.A. in the fastest possible time while adding two more children to her brood of nine! These are the kind of determined students that the Open University caters to. There are 65,000 students enrolled after only three years of operation of Britain's only extension university. The degrees they receive are equal to any other British university degree in quality, but the amount of effort put into the courses by people who work all day as well as study by correspondence is rarely matched by undergraduates at other universities.

Sir Walter Perry, himself a graduate of St. Andrew's University, Scotland is the vice-Chancellor of the Open University and this year's Brockington Visitor. He talked to me about the concept of the Open University.

Why did you feel there was a need for an Open University in Britain?

In Britain the proportion of people attending university was much lower than in Europe and North America. Just after the war only about 5 per cent of people aged 18 attended university. This meant that a large proportion of the adult population had been denied a university education, and we felt this was a national asset which was wasted and needed to be tapped. Therefore, we had to offer a form of education that would work for them; that meant taking the education to them rather than bringing them to an institution.

Have you any idea why the "regular universities" in Britain have never made use of correspondence courses?

I suppose because the need to reach out for students was never seen as necessary. Only in the Islands and Highlands of Scotland would there ever be a problem of distance in getting to an institution. I think it's also almost impossible for a private institution to attract enough people by correspondence to make it pay.

Correspondence courses are very expensive if they are of high quality, and you need a large number of students in order to make them a paying proposition.

Have you found that the fee of 45 Pound Sterling per course restricts the number of people who are able to take open university courses in lower income groups?

We think that the recent jump from 25 to 45 Pound Sterling (approx. $78.75) is beginning to affect some of the poorer students, but 45 P.S. is still a very much lower fee than you would find in North America. However one of our criteria was to make sure that nobody would be excluded from taking courses at the Open University for financial reasons, and so we're sorry it's even as high as it is.

Do you think that an Open University would work in Canada, especially in the North where the population is scattered and so far away from universities?

I suspect it wouldn't be a very good idea because the population is so much smaller and 90 per cent of it is concentrated in the cities. As you already provide correspondence courses through your universities, an Open University concept would not be financially plausible. There just aren't enough students to draw on.

As well as the 400 full-time professors who design the Open University's courses and the 6,000 part-time markers, you use a network of radio and television programs to teach a number of courses. Do you feel that the Open University and the BBC have found the key to using the media for educational purposes?

I think we've found some of the answers. I think one of the most important decisions that we have made is that you can't use television as the main medium of instruction. It's absolute madness to put a talking face on a television set, you might as well enclose a picture of the man with his printed lecture. You use television where you need a moving video image. We have 35 hours of television air time a week, but with 200 different courses you have to learn to use it selectively, for the courses that benefit best from the use of television.

Do you think Marshall McLuhan's revolutionary discovery that "the medium is the message" played a large part in the concept of the Open University or did you decide to employ the media later?

Well, the politicians were probably sparked into giving money to the University by the "media revolution." But when the academics came along and tried to make it work, we made our plans first and then saw if the media could be used successfully.

I think the most frequently-voiced reservation about the concept of the Open University is that it doesn't deal with anything beyond taking courses. "Regular universities," on the other hand involve much more than "just going to classes," there is a total university experience which the Open University's students will necessarily miss out on. Do you agree?

Yes, of course I do. The Open University is not an alternative, it's a complement. It's a way of providing a chance to those for whom the best way is closed. I would no more dream of suggesting that 18-year-olds be taught through the Open University than fly in the air—if there was any alternative. For that reason we don't accept anyone under the age of 21, because if you're dealing with an adult who is working for his living—you're providing a much more difficult way to get a degree. Also you've got to remember that almost 90 per cent of our students live in an area where they can take advantage of the self-help group tutors that we have set up at 300 study centres.

I remember seeing a documentary about the Open University on television and it showed a group of people, all different ages, doing a chemistry experiment. It was in the summer and they were using the facilities of a local institution to conduct a series of seminars. Do you make use of the summer holidays to conduct the self-help groups you mentioned?

We run a compulsory summer school session for a lot of our courses, because it offers students a chance to meet their fellows while providing a necessary supplement to any kind of experimental courses. We hold the summer school in the middle of our school year so that the students can benefit as much as possible from the experience of using the university laboratory facilities for one week. Of course in order to get them all up to approximately the same level by the summer seminar they have to race through a lot of work in the first term—up to two or three years of high school in a few months. So that at the end of the year they have achieved the qualifications to enter second year.

Queen's has a number of professional faculties and it seems that each year students find themselves discussing the merits of getting a training for the job market as opposed to getting a liberal arts education. As a number of your students are teachers who are upgrading their qualifications, I wondered if the Open University was more concerned with one type of education than another.

I think like most universities it caters for both. I think that most people who go to university go to get some kind of a qualification, I think the number of "natural" scholars who are studying for the sheer joy of studying is really very small. An awful lot of guff is talked about scholarship for the sake of scholarship; a lot of it based on the quite erroneous assumption that an education in the liberal arts fits a man for everything in life.

Do you provide any professional courses at the Open University?

Yes, we teach technology. We haven't yet got a sufficient spectrum of courses in, say, electronics for a student to get recognition from the electrical engineering society. There are enough courses offered in psychology for a student to get professional recognition, but you must remember that it would be nearly impossible to learn nuclear physics or engineering chemistry by correspondence—it's just too sophisticated.

Elrond struggling - but it will survive

by Hugh Dodd

"Elrond will be here in 10 years - I believe it fully," said Peter Stokes, a member of the Elrond Board of Directors. "Queen's would not want to change it into a University residence."

A recent Review Committee Report on Elrond College concluded there would be significant financial problems by April of this year. This past week there have been discussions with the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation (CMHC), holder of the first mortgage on Elrond, over the financial fate of the co-operative college.

In order to fully appreciate the present financial problems and their implications, one must view the history and purpose of Elrond College.

Elrond opened in December 1972 under constrained circumstances. It was expected to be open in September of the same year, but construction had not yet been completed. Even in December, the building was not finished, and in its first year, the college lost members due to this situation. Furthermore, for the members who did stay, there remained the problems of contending with construction until the summer of 1973. The early problems were severe, and the present financial straits are an inheritance of the difficulties encountered. The increased cost during this 1972-73 construction period must be sustained by current membership.

The purpose of Elrond

What was Elrond designed for? It was meant to be a residence, but more than that, a series of values and ideals were built into the design and administration of the building. Elrond College consists of 16 floors, yet there are only five elevator stops. There are a great variety of room designs - split level, one and two bedroom apartments, and 2,4,6, and 12-person houses built into the network of the College.

The ideals mesh with the current financial situation. The Board of Directors is trying to make Elrond attractive from a price point of view. To make the price attractive, the College must be filled, if it is to meet its commitment as a student-owned and student-operated co-operative. Why are there vacancies? There are certain responsibilities that are taken on when one is a member of a co-op arrangement. Each person is assigned shifts on maintenance, security, and if on the meal plan, as kitchen help. With students being assigned shifts, the college can be operated more cheaply. Furthermore, there is an important contribution to the ideals of the college. Within the work environment, it is hoped that students acquire a feeling for "shared work experience". The problem is that accommodation prices are not perceived by students at Queen's as being that much different than those in residence. Queen's students raise the legitimate question, "Why should I do all the work involved in a co-operative, and pay almost as much as residence fees? However, Mr. Stokes points out that there is a substantial income tax rebate ($200) from the Province of Ontario to each member of Elrond, since Elrond pays municipal taxes.

Residents enthusiastic

The attitude and spirit in the building this year is "very good and positive", according to Mr. Stokes. "There are fewer problems this year" than there have been in the past. There are always problems getting some people to take their full share of responsibilities, but the feeling is enthusiastic for the most part. This attitude was clearly evident last week when a general meeting was held to discuss the future of the college.

Elrond, in its early stages, had the positive support of Queen's University. Queen's holds Elrond's second mortgage, thus being the only university to actively support the co-operative concept. Rochdale College in Toronto, and Pestalozzi College in Ottawa, two other examples of the co-op arrangement, received no funding from nearby universities. If Elrond has had success it has been because of support from Queen's. Queen's provided advice and professional guidance on money matters. On a more general basis, the University referred students to Elrond, and helped the co-operative chart its course through the present housing market.

The AMS has also taken an active role in Elrond's history, and now have the third mortgage on the building. In the late 1960's, the AMS perceived a housing crisis looming at Queen's. Furthermore, the National Housing Act was giving support to the co-operative concept. Rochdale, the product of the Student Activism of the '60s, did not have a bad name at that time. Rather, it was regarded as a bold new innovation in student living. Blending both motivations, the student leaders and the administration of Queen's, led by former Principal John J. Deutch, gave substantial encouragement to make the concept of Elrond a reality.

Elrond operating with deficits

Working with a fixed rate of interest on the CMHC mortgage, it was felt the college would be viable. However, due to early litigation and increased building costs, Elrond has not attracted enough residents for full occupancy. The current members have had to bear the initial costs, which were higher than originally supposed. The higher price therefore affects the marketability of the rooms. It's a vicious circle. Elrond is currently operating with deficits. Due to the fixed rate of interest, inflation may partially offset this problem. Mr. Stokes feels that Elrond will eventually turn the corner in its financial difficulties, but the question that arises is: When will this happen? If Elrond has to continue to borrow from the bank to meet its deficits, the interest on the loans just adds more to the operating costs. The discussions with CMHC concern this issue. Can any adjustment or agreement concerning the mortgage be made at less of a handicap to Elrond?

And what about Queen's?

According to Mr. Stokes, "Queen's has been an extremely generous benefactor. However, currently the University wishes Elrond to resolve its principal financial problems with CMHC."

Few professional staffers

There is more to Elrond than the financial aspect. Through cultural, educational and social programs, Elrond provides a sense of identity for its members that is absolutely essential for a co-op to work.

The Elrond administration consists of a Board of Directors, with three members elected from the college, three AMS members, and two members from the Board of Trustees of Queen's. This Board has the legal authority for the direction of the College. There are a few professional staff members at the College, consisting of a general manager, an administrative assistant, two maintenance people and a cook. These people, along with a number of student committees, overlook the operation of Elrond. That is an impressively small number of salaried staff, when one considers that Elrond has room for 430 members.

There are seven "neighbourhoods" within Elrond, and each has its own social organization. Thus there is local diversity within the College. Recently, Elrond founded a radio station to pipe FM music through the corridors of the building. It has been a popular innovation, and there are more than enough announcers willing to do shows on the station. There is a library for general interest reading, along with crafts, a photography lab, T.V. room, music room, conference room, sauna, lounge and games room. Athletics consist of basketball, football, and broomball, among other things. Elrond wishes to contribute positively to the educational experience, and as well, provide social education and responsibility from a different perspective.

Will Elrond survive? To answer that question, Elrond is currently accepting applications in full expectation of business as usual next year.

Americans should work towards socialism....

Bernadette Devlin against oppression

by Jeff Kessler

When Bernadette Devlin McAliskey was first across the international press as the youngest Member of Parliament, it was 1969. What had begun as peaceful protesting in Northern Ireland had turned into full-scale street warfare, and British troops had been called in, supposedly to protect the Northern Irish from one another.

In North America there appeared to be some type of grass roots rebellion in the making. The protests seemed more pervasive than strictly anti-war. In December of that year, Bernadette Devlin went to Columbia University and before an overflow crowd of several thousand, exhorted listeners to believe in the common cause, that while the struggle in Ireland may not exactly be our fight it is none the less everyone's fight insofar as it is a struggle for freedom and for human dignity.

Seven years later, December, Bernadette returned to Columbia. The condition in Northern Ireland remained the same, but the situation over here had certainly changed - as had Bernadette Devlin.

Speaking before about 800 people in the gymnasium, Devlin re-examined the historical reasons for the conflict in Northern Ireland and pressed her campaign for helping victims of the state of emergency in South Ireland. However, her ultimate message carried a new twist: "If you Americans really want to help us, build the struggle in your own country." The struggle, for Devlin, is the struggle toward socialism.

There are two views the rest of the world holds toward the strife in Ireland, Devlin said. One is that there is some kind of "racial aberration" drawing the Irish into constant conflict, that there is a medieval religious war going on in Ireland. The second view is that Ireland is being torn apart by a small group of "pathological political killers."

"These views are grist of the public's willingness to believe whatever it reads in the newspapers or sees on television," she said.

Citing from her plain-spoken autobiography, The Price of My Soul, Devlin gave a brief summary of the evolution of Northern Ireland to clarify "just what the real issue is to be presented."

According to Devlin, in 1609 the British Empire transplanted thousands of Scottish Presbyterians to the nine counties of Northern Ireland that composed the ancient kingdom of Ulster. These Protestant colonists were meant to keep the rebellious Irish under control, and they did, insofar as they formed an upper class and became the landed gentry, while the Irish Catholics formed the peasant class. "The traditional hatred between the colonists and the colonized, the haves and the have-nots, was further complicated by religious hatred. Politics and religion have never separated themselves in Northern Ireland."

In 1801, with the Act of Union, Ireland's linen and wool economy was sacrificed for the British cotton industry. Devlin commented that "this caused a resurgence of nationalist activity, generally nonsectarian, which culminated in Easter Rising of 1916."

"The citizens of Ulster took very little part in this doomed revolution," partly, Devlin pointed out, because of poor organization. Whatever the reason, the northern counties were already regarded with hostility by the south - they were called "Orange", condemned for being the offspring of Protestants who had supported the Dutch William of Orange against James II, the Catholic King of England, in the late 17th century.

The Easter Rising may have failed, but that action and the fact that in 1918 Ireland peacefully voted to be removed from the British Empire, forced the British to realize they could hold on no longer. In 1921 Ireland was divided, forming the Free State to the south. Six predominantly Protestant counties went to the formation of Northern Ireland; they were six of the nine counties of Ulster.

Devlin came to be involved in the pacifist movement in 1969 while still a student at Belfast. These peaceful protest marches quickly deteriorated into street fighting. In a country where unemployment is so high, where housing is such a problem, and where a large segment of the population, the Catholics, are treated as second-class citizens, religious tension is still high. In Derry, in 1969, it appeared that the Protestants were going to slaughter the Catholics. The police were unable to contain the street fighting and the predominantly Protestant B-Men, a special civilian militia, were called out. Finally, British troops were brought in to keep the peace. The Catholics cheered their arrival, heedless of the fact that British troops were once again on Irish soil.

Devlin said that when she brought this up in a speech, reminding the Catholic crowd that the British had come not to protect the Catholics, but to preserve the State of Northern Ireland, she was booed off the rostrum by her fellow Republicans. That she can say "I told you so" is no comfort to this small but powerful woman.

That is the background of the present conflict in Northern Ireland. "I would love to say it is a class struggle," Devlin sighed. "But it's not. It is a day-to-day struggle against oppression, against second-class citizenship."

In an interview, Devlin commented on the women's peace movement presently taking place in Northern Ireland. "They have no politics. The oppressed cannot be the first to lay down their weapons. They would be walked all over. These women's demands for peace are demands by the oppressed to the oppressed."

Devlin was gravely concerned about a new twist in the turn of events in supposedly free South Ireland where the constitution has been suspended the basis rights of citizenship have been denied - all in the name of law and order. A state of emergency has been declared "as South Ireland batters down the hatches to prevent the onslaught of terrorist activity from the North."

"Press censorship has been taken so far that newspapers have been told they are responsible for the views expressed in letters to the editor," said Devlin.

Alleged criminals, she added, if they are said to be political activists, can be tried without jury in special political courts. All one needs for this is the word of one policeman.

Devlin told Canadian University Press: We have cut ourselves in two tightening our belts. There is no way this system can give us all we want. They can't afford to treat us equally - there's no room in the system. And despite what the British would have you believe, capitalism and socialism cannot exist in harmony.

There are two priorities in the Irish struggle for freedom, she said. The first is to remove the British troops from Irish soil, and the second to create a socialist reform in Ireland. "As it is," she added, "South Ireland is quickly evolving into a satellite state of Great Britain, and Northern Ireland is so torn by dissension that people are not only jobless but homeless. We have to take back what has been taken from us the means of production and distribution."

Discussing the need for socialism in America, Devlin said that the last time Americans admitted to a working class was during the Depression. "Since then there is no one who will admit to being working class - anyone who has a job is considered middle class. 'Everyone is so busy protecting what he has that no one knows what has been taken away.' The job of a socialist 'revolutionary' is to work in the working class, 'to educate within the working class. We have so many dangerous reactionary ideas we have to educate ourselves out of', Devlin pleaded during her speech.

"Don't put on Che Guervara hats and raise your clenched fists and wave your rifles. Join the working classes."

Rosalyn Tureck - Versatile Bach Specialist

Rosalyn Tureck plays Bach at Dunning, March 2.

by Cathy Fuyarchuk

On Wednesday, March 2 at 8:30 p.m. Rosalyn Tureck will give an all-Bach performance in Dunning Hall. This American-born Bach specialist—whether as pianist, harpsichordist, conductor or scholar—has devoted her life to the study of the great 17th-century German composer and is recognized as one of the world's foremost experts on his music.

Tureck made her performing debut in a series of solo recitals at the ages of nine and began intensive Bach studies at 14, studying the harpsichord, clavichord and organ, as well as doing research in Bach performance practices. She pursued two parallel fields of study; not only did Tureck delve into piano repertoire and musical development, she also studied Bach in depth—historically, structurally, and in baroque instruments. As she herself has said, "I realized that I must change all my ideas, give up everything I had been taught and had heard, and start again. I had to form new ways of thinking about music, new keyboard techniques of phrasing, dynamics, touch and endless means of performance. I had to create a totally new tonal and physical piano technique to match this deeper perception of what Bach's music and structure really is."

Her total immersion in Bach's work soon became evident in her playing. At 18, she began her lecturing career and soon after achieved worldwide recognition with her New York and London debuts. At the age of 22, Tureck gave six all-Bach concerts in New York in six weeks, performing the entire 48 Preludes and Fugues of the Goldberg Variations, Partitas, Suites and miscellaneous works. Standing ovations in sold-out houses throughout Europe began in 1954 and have continued ever since in the U.S. and around the world.

Mme Tureck holds honorary doctorates in music from several colleges in the United States along with the Diploma of Honorary Membership in the Guildhall School of Music and Drama in London for distinguished services to music.

Tickets for Rosalyn Tureck's concert in Kingston can be obtained at the Performing Arts Box Office in the John Deutsch University Centre or at the door the evening of the performance.

Film Perspective. . .

Sadness and loss - a look at the Japanese cinema

by David McCallum

There is a conflict which pervades Japanese cinema between the old and the new, between traditional values and modern ones. Japan, in the transition stage between a medieval, feudal way of life and a modernistic, capitalistic, industrial one. And this is reflected in its cinema. Japanese cinema is filled with a sense of sadness, a sense of loss; sadness over the loss of stability and security of the old ways, and a sense of apprehension about the future.

Ozu, with his stable compositions, camera and emotions tried, I think, to recapture a feeling of the old ways on the screen. Kurosawa, with his dynamic action and camera recreates the sense of immediacy of industrial Japan. Mizoguchi, it has been pointed out many times, lied somewhere between the extremes of Ozu and Kurosawa. However, in the films of all three directors there remains the same sense of melancholy.

Robin Wood has pointed out that while Ozu's visual compositions are dominated by the square and the rectangle, Mizoguchi's are characterized by an emphasis on diagonals. Each image of Ozu's takes on the quality of a framed picture, cut off from any outer world beyond the confines of the screen. In Mizoguchi, Wood says, the diagonals invariably lead the eye outwards, always implying a world beyond the frame. This, I think is a useful way of looking at Mizoguchi. Off-screen space and off-screen sound are important in Ugetsu Monogatari.

The film takes place during a time of war and the sounds of war in the background remind us that the individuals on the screen are just a few of the many caught up in the maelstrom of the times. War, it has been stated, can be seen as an equivalent of the social turmoil of present day Japan.

Mizoguchi also uses, as opposed to Ozu, a moving camera. This camera places individuals in their environment but it also creates a worrying effect. The viewer is constantly surprised by something which is revealed by the camera. We are made to feel the incomprehensibility of things; the precariousness of things.

In Ugetsu two different women provide the potter with shelter from the turmoil of the times. Both however are destroyed by the potter. The sense of sadness which ends the film, I feel, is a sadness characteristic of many Japanese films. From a first viewing, I felt that the final scene of the potter and his wife, together was very Ozu-like, with the wife representing the serenity, stability of the old ways. The sense of loss for the wife is the same as the nostalgia for a lost era.

However, the film ends on an up-note with the son providing a link between the old and the new.

Cockburn in Concert

Five years ago, with the release of his initial True North record, Bruce Cockburn cast a most enchanting spell on Canadian music audiences. It was a spell that music critics across the country quickly succumbed to, in unanimous ranks. In the unrestrained joy of their consistently rave responses, one could sense the arrival of a major new artist.

As critics will do with new artists, they sought a label to pin on Cockburn or a set of artists to group him with; so often the kiss of death in the music industry. However, in Bruce Cockburn's musicianship, and gift for tasteful composition, they could find no room for comparison: his style was truly his alone.

Today, with seven highly successful albums, numerous Juno awards, and three much-heralded national tours, comparisons of a different sort are coming to the man who has been called "Canada's master musician." His name is used to enhance the efforts of a bright new artist, or as a standard of excellence by which the works of other established recording stars might be measured.

Cockburn will be appearing in Kingston at Grant Hall, Friday March 4 at 8:00 p.m. and Saturday, March 5 at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are available ($4.50 advance, $5.50 at the door) from the Performing Arts Box Office and at various Kingston locations. We'll have a preview look at Cockburn and his Canadian career in the first post-reading week edition of the Journal.

Another look at Canadian consciousness

by Eric Hughes

Remember the days when "Canadian consciousness" was a phrase either spoken by or spit from just about every mouth north of the 49th parallel? The time seems to have arrived, however, when any new renditions of "Le Canadian-what is he?" meet with as enthusiastic a response as do reruns of Quentin Durgens MP. Have we lost our desire to find out who we are? or have we found something out we don't like? or was Canadian consciousness nothing more than a publicity stunt designed to sell his Maclean's magazines?

My answer would have to be (d) All of the above. As with any truly valuable pursuit (and of course many not so valuable), the media must needs become involved. Inevitably, it takes over. Still, this did not happen fast enough to prevent us from discovering some very interesting things about ourselves before we (whether or not it was on purpose doesn't matter) tired of the search.

What, then, did we find? Did we find any common ground upon which some sort of Canadian identity (and hence, as is the point of this article, any, some sort of valid Canadian entertainment world) could be built? Let's see what some of the results in terms of the drama have been.

A prime example of Canadian drama is David French's Leaving Home (performed at the Domino Theatre several years back). Here, a Newfoundlander has to contend with the rebelliousness of one son and the impending marriage of another to the girl he has "got in trouble." Encapsulation is not fair to the plot, but one can see that there is nothing intrinsically Canadian about the story; i.e., it would just as easily take place in New York City or Lima, Peru.

The same can be said of the CBC's recent dramatic series about immigrants. If the first episode was any indication of what the series was like (I could not watch anymore—I have a weak stomach), the series was trash. And it was not even intrinsically Canadian trash. How's this for a story?

Boy meets girl. Boy cannot have girl because she is from strong ethnic family and must marry local success-story or face wrath of father. Girl loves boy, tries to kill herself at engagement party for success-story-keep-papa-happy-wedding. When she comes to, she leaves home (through window of locked bedroom) to move in with love of her life. Upon returning home to retrieve suitcase of clothes, girl meets despondent father in hall (he hasn't eaten since she left). He picks up handy bread knife and stabs her. Slow-motion-stop-action close-ups of knife and various faces contorted in pain. The End. Except for the ending, MGM could have been more original with Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney. But wait, I forgot to mention the one big difference. The CBC show was about Greeks. And that makes it Canadian.

Maybe the key to this fear of discovering something Canadian INSIDE OURSELVES can be found in the chance encounter I had on the street today. As I was walking home from the corner store (looking at my feet, of course, to keep from becoming another casualty of the Blizzard of '77) I heard a tiny voice loudly hailing me with a "How are you, mister?" I looked up to see a child of about seven holding an oddly contrived, painted gauze mask in front of her face. She was giggling, "My, but you frightened me," I good-sportedly replied in my most studied Dick and Jane manner. But, yes, I was amazed when she took the mask off of her face to make her get-away; and I recognized her as the little girl who lives down the street—the little girl who, up until this time, had never said "hello" let alone "boo," to me.

Maybe we Canadians need a mask ourselves. Maybe that is why we look to other countries, to stereotyped stories and people. We want something behind which we can safely masquerade because we don't know what we really have to offer; and the truth of it is, we're just a little afraid of finding out.

More on this after reading week—and have a good one.

The final team standings had Queen's on top with 120 points with Western and University of Toronto earning the silver and bronze medals respectively. Western had 97 points and finished with 86. Anchoring down 4th and 5th positions were McMaster and York with 69 and 31 points respectively.

It is anticipated that Nancy Brennan will choose to retire from Queen's coaching next year. If so it will be a great loss to Queen's athletics as she made a great contribution in helping to guide the development of her skaters up to championship calibre. The Queen's figure skating team would like to thank all those who cheered them on to victory and hope they can make it S for next year.

Bews Hockey

Down to nitty gritty

by Mike Gouinlock

Two weeks ago in this column I recognized some graduating Queen's students who had contributed a lot of time and hard work to the intramural program over the past years. There was a notable absentee from that list: Kerry Powell, last year's PHE stick and this year's Education stick was neglected from that list through an oversight on my part. Kerry set a record for Bews championships while in PHE and this year has guided Education to its highest standing ever. Through his hard work, Education is no longer a joke unit in the program. Once again I apologize to Kerry for missing him first time around.

On Wednesday, the first round of the hockey playoffs was held, however at press time the results were not known. The match-ups went as follows: Game no. 1 Meds (10-0-0) vs. Mechanical (7-3-0). Meds has an extremely well-balanced team. They have more than adequate goaltending, a very strong, quick defence, and good strong skating forwards. The loss of Gord Porter may affect their championship hopes but should not hinder them in this game. For Mechanical to engineer the upset, they must receive strong goaltending from Jim McDonnell and stop taking the stupid penalties which have plagued them all season long.

Game no. 2 Arts 78 (9-1-0) vs. PHE (7-2-1). '78 is big and strong defensively. Ross Pearman has an incredibly quick glove hand. John McDonald, Matt O'Brien, Scott Campbell, Bob Smallwood and Scott Pritchard pick up the scoring slack. PHE has the skating ability to beat '78 but they probably lack the depth and scoring power. '78 will have to be cold to lose this one. Game no. 3 Arts 77 (8-1-1) vs. Mining (7-2-1). Like Arts 78, '77 is very strong defensively. John Lloyd has very quick hands, but has a tendency to yield too many rebounds. He gets a lot of help from his three defencemen who move the puck well. Simon Lewis, Bobby McNaul and Rod Brown lead the scoring punch while Jim Begaj and Chris Boland patrol the corners.

In securing sixth place in the overall standings, Mining looked impressive in their Tuesday night shutout of PHE. Ian Berzins gives them quality netminding and the Shirkoffs give them an explosive offence. Mining is definitely capable of the victory in this game. For '77 to win its second consecutive championship they will have to get it all going in one game, an extremely difficult task.

Game no. 4 Commerce 79 (8-1-1) vs. Commerce 78 (8-1-1). This should be the best game of the quarter-final round. '79 has the best skating team in the league while '78 has one of the best checking teams. '78 goalie Frank McAuley is in a class by himself but he suffers from lack of work. In this game he will be given a good test by '79 gunners, Craig Arnoldi, Flesch, Gray and Brown. Penalties could be the significant factor in the game. The loss of Guy Gasgrain will hurt the 78 defence. In fact '78's success will probably depend on their ability to move the puck out of their own end. Golden Gaels end dismal season

by Jean Bangay

Tuesday night's hockey game at Jock Harty Arena between the Queen's Golden Gaels and the University of Ottawa Gee Gees marked the end of what could only be termed a hapless season for the hockey Gaels. The score 5-1 in favour of the Gee Gees, unfortunately reflected the game fairly. The Gaels just did not have it (whatever "it" is) for their last OUA A game of the season.

They started out well in the first period, especially the line of Willie Wing, Gary Brandt and Kevin Treacy which had four shots on goal during its first shift on the ice. But before they could get to the bench, the play was carried by a strong Ottawa attack into the Queen's end, and goalie Andy Schell was forced to make three nearly impossible saves. This type of play was indicative of the game at least from the Gaels' point of view. There would be some good playmaking in the Ottawa end, then a complete turnaround which, five times, resulted in a goal. The absence of Glenn Furgoch from the line-up was sorely felt, as he was forced to sit out because of an injury sustained against the U. of T. Varsity Blues a week ago. Accordingly, the defence pairs had to be shifted around resulting in some confusion in front of the Queen's net. The only penalty of the game was against Ottawa and came at 8:23 of the first period, but the Queen's powerplay of Ned and John MacIntyre, Terry Angel and Jay Babcock with Kevin Treacy on the points could not score on hot Ottawa goaltender Bill Thompson. The only score was by Ottawa's Bob Crepin on a shot that Andy Schell got a piece of but which bounced into the net off a post.

After a good first period in which the Gaels outshot their opponents 11-8, the second was a disaster. An initial burst by Earl Moulton, Dale Sandler and Joe Pecaric (an awesome line as far as size is concerned) and some intelligent playmaking by Jay Babcock seemed to keep the Gaels in sight of a goal, but about half way through the period the team fell apart. Goals by Ottawa's Rick Mackuk and Kevin Benson made the score 3-0 and what had been a fairly evenly-matched game until that point became glaringly one-sided, obvious in the shots on goal: 18-8 in favour of Ottawa.

Once again Queen's started out the third period by forcing the Ottawa goalie to make some big saves, but this flurry did not last long. Two more Ottawa goals brought the score up to 5-0 and the Gaels were only saved from being shut out by Kevin Treacy's goal from Gary Brandt at 17:56. The shots on goal seemed fairly even (32-31 in favour of Ottawa) although the play often did not reflect those numbers.

So ended the 1976-1977 OUA A season for the Queen's hockey Gaels. For some it was the last game they would play for Queen's. Captain Frank Coffey, Glenn Furgoch, Joe Pecaric, Earl Moulton, Ted Grant and Terry Angel will not be returning to the Gaels' lineup next year. However those who will be back (veterans Brian Harrington, Ned MacIntyre, Willie Wing and Dale Sandler, and this year's long list of "rookies" which included John MacIntyre, Kevin Treacy, Gary Brandt, Mike Reilly, Jay Babcock, Wayne Clapp and goaltender Jeff Beck) are certainly the backbone of what could be, potentially, a strong contender in the OUA A east division. This year's Gaels had very little of that magic ingredient which helps a team make it to the top. So many games were much closer than the scores indicate, and goalposts around the league are still ringing from Queen's goals that didn't quite make it. If the Gaels can start off next season healthy they will have a great advantage over this year's team which at various times (but mostly early in the year) lost the services of such valuable members as Willie Wing, Ned MacIntyre, Kevin Treacy, Glenn Furgoch and Dave Eaton. It is unfortunate that Mike Babcock's first year as coach here at Queen's could not have been more successful, but the outcome of this season is not a reflection on him or anyone in particular. With a more unified effort, a lot of hard work, a little luck (as well as a great deal more fan support!) next season's Gaels could really provide something to cheer about.

Gaels lose 8-4, 7-5

Voyageurs in 3rd

by Tom Shand

In OUA A hockey action at Sudbury this weekend the Laurentian Voyageurs assured themselves of a playoff berth with a twin sweep of their games with the Queen's Golden Gaels. The Gaels lost on Saturday night by 8-4 with the Voyageurs gaining a 7-5 victory on Sunday afternoon.

The four points gave the Voyageurs 7 of 8 possible points in their season series with the Gaels. Queen's performed much better than they had in their previous encounters with Laurentian but their hosts were a much improved hockey club from the one which visited the Jock Harty in November; their driving force still being their superb conditioning and uncompromising team effort.

One is left with the feeling that although they are the least talented of the playoff teams they are nevertheless very much in contention. The condition of the Laurentian team is no accident but rather the direct result of a summer land training program for the prospective players with a follow-up fitness test which eliminated some talent but ensured motivation.

The flow of play in Saturday's contest was virtually even but the Gaels put themselves out of contention with costly mistakes. Goaltender Jeff Beck got off to a bus trip-induced shaky start while his cohorts showed a great propensity for adding to his miseries with a seemingly endless number of goofs in their own end. The desire and talent were available for use but a rushed meal and a long bus trip served to eliminate the mental sharpness necessary to convert these assets into victory. Kevin Treacy's four goalposts which he woke up dreaming about Saturday morning certainly did not add to the cause. Willie Wing notched a pair of goals for Queen's with Gary Brandt and Terry Angel adding singles. Eight different players scored for the Voyageurs.

Gaels settled down on Sunday afternoon but the Voyageurs took the game to them in the last half to earn their playoff spot. The line of Treacy, Brandt, and Wing continued on their spurge with Treacy scoring a pair and Wing adding a single. Terry Angel added to his team-leading total with a blistering slap shot which would have burned a hole in any goalie in this league or any other. Dale Sandler fired home the final goal on a pretty power play effort - something which the Gaels have been sadly in need of all season. Paul Tricco gained the hat trick for the Voyageurs while shifty centre-man Brian Heale earned a pair. Peter DeMarco and Tim Stortini both managed a single tally on Gaels' goaltender Andy Schell.

Brian Harrington also had his name on the scoring summary many times as he was allotted seven minor penalties—an unlooked for season high.

Although the Gaels failed to register any points in the standings, the trip was far from being eventless for as coach Babcock said to one reporter "You can't tell me you don't enjoy travelling with this team." Some of the repeatable highlights included Albert Allmark giving a needed display of his fireman talents, Sudbury's first Annual Laundry Bin Derby which featured high speed crashes and daredevil manoeuvres by Ned and "Treace", and the dousing of "Watts" and an unidentified pizza man by two "no longer rookies".

A damper was put on the weekend when the players learned that their make-up with the Blues had been cancelled.

Not a happy season for coach and crew

Queen's wrestlers display power

by Alex Faseruk

Last Sunday the Golden Grapplers finished off the regular season with a very powerful display of strength at the tough Toronto Open. Five of the team managed to place within the top four of their respective weight classes.

Queen's dominated the heavyweight class by finishing first and second. Coach Roy Worthington won his third tournament of the year. Close on his heels was Murray Buchanan as he captured second place by pinning former Ontario Champion Clive Thurston, coach of the Etobicoke Wrestling Club.

At 142 lbs. Mike Moggridge and Chris Thomas managed to finish second and third respectively. The weight class was won by Canadian Champion Mike Barry from Western.

Thom Rhind was able to finish fourth in the 190 lb. weight class.

This weekend the Gaels will travel to Waterloo to compete in the OUAA Championship which will be held on Saturday, February 19 and Sunday, February 20 at the University of Waterloo. The team will be Queen's strongest squad in a number of years. Usually Queen's is only able to send five or six wrestlers to the championships. This year Queen's will be represented by 10 wrestlers in all of the weight classes except the 109 lb. and 118 lb. This year the Grapplers, in regular season and open competition, have walked off with an enormous amount of hardware from tournaments. With a little bit of luck and a few breaks Queen's could capture third place which is the best that it could hope to accomplish. Western and Guelph, the perennial powerhouses in wrestling will be battling it out for top honours. Western is the pre-tournament favourite to walk away with the championship.

The first and second place wrestlers from the OUAA championships will go on to wrestle in the CIAU championships which will be held in two weeks time at Guelph. Queen's has not had a wrestler compete in the CIAU championships since 1971 when Bob Cazes captured the Canadian Championship. The last time that Queen's earned a medal at the OUAA championships was in 1973 when Rob Beamish managed a third-place finish.

The Golden Grapplers should however be able to carry home a few medals this year and will hopefully improve upon its usual sixth-place finish at the Championships.

Queen's womens squash team favoured to win OWIAA finals

The Queen's Women's Squash team travels to McMaster today for the OWIAA Finals, and last weekend they warmed up by playing in the Ontario Ladies "B" Tournament at Toronto Lawn Tennis Club. The competition, however, was a lot tougher than that encountered on the university circuit. Three of the five Queen's players were first round losers and moved into consolation play, while Queen's number one player Sandra Harris was eliminated in the second round along with Coach Janice Longhurst.

On the whole, though, Queen's could not be disappointed with their play. Joann Price played her best squash of the year despite losing 3-2 to Ontario Team Member Patsy Cross. In the consolation round, she defeated Diane Mackenzie 3-1 before losing to consolation finalist Janice Rowley, again by 3-2. Jane Forbes-Roberts lost to JoAnne Fletcher in the main draw and Bev Oliver in the consolation, but took one game from each.

Sandra Harris moved into the second round by blanking Bobbie Frost 3-0, but suffered a disappointing loss to Jenny Bradshaw of Ottawa by a 3-2 count. Janice Longhurst also won her first round 3-0, over Sue Stevens, only to run into a tough second round - top seed Barb Evans of Toronto, who eliminated her from further play.

It was left to Queen's number two player, Jana Sawynok, to make the outstanding showing of the tournament for Queen's. In the first round Jana gave Susan Pexman of England, one of her toughest matches despite the 3-0 score. Moving to the consolation round, she scored consecutive 3-0 wins over Bev Oliver and Jane Moyer, then finished off the consolation round as the winner with 3-1 wins over Jill Mason and Janice Rowley. The ultimate winner of the tournament was Susan Pexman, who defeated Barb Evans easily. This weekend at McMaster, Queen's will compete with U. of T., York, Waterloo, and Mac for the OWIAA Championship. Last year Queen's was a close runner-up to Waterloo, and this year they have completely dominated the university tournaments with all teams. Queen's will be the strong favourite to win this week.

Speedswim success

Despite a small team and a long and gruelling bus trip to Sudbury, our very own Golden Gal swimmers and divers sped and dove their way to a very commendable fifth-place finish, out of ten, in the Ontario championships held at Laurentian University this past weekend. Outstanding performances were recorded by Janet Nutter who won the gold medal in the 1-meter Diving, set a new Queen's record for this event, and automatically won a spot on the Ontario team to the CIAU's; Eve Wahn, who not only dazzled the photographers but the judges as well (was it her eyebrow?!) and qualified for the nationals along with Diana Harrison, who placed fourth in the exciting 50-yd. Freestyle final, where she also set a new Queen's record.

These excellent performances by our swimmers were even more amazing when one considers the adventures and trials encountered during their three days spent in downtown "Mudbury". Their fearless coach, Sheila, led them out of the way of speeding trains, but right into the arms of the lurking Gael's hockey team. She wasn't too responsible to the midnight serenades of the wild family from Borneo, but dancing with Albert and compliments from a local drunk in the front lobby just made her weekend. Nelson's famous lock of hair is even rumored to have stood on end with all the goings-on, while our dedicated swimmers battled sauna-type conditions in their rooms, and rather generous portions of chlorine in the pool. Undaunted by all adversities however, every single person put in at least one all-time best performance, and virtually every member of the team made one final.

Bev 'the Kid' Webb placed very well, and just missed the qualifying time in both her 50 and 100 Free. (Her antics on the pool deck were undeniably worth an Academy Award though!) Carol Kennedy, an experienced team veteran did very well in the consolation finals of both the 100 and 200 Fly and Sue Sculthorpe swam faster than ever before in the 50, 100, and 200 Free events. Francine Vickery took her foot out of her mouth long enough to compete in the 200, 400 and 800 Freestyle and placed well in the consolations, as did Lucie Hewitt in the 200 Breaststroke (finally going under the magic 3 minute mark). Jennifer Hietala giggled her way to the finals in the 100 Butterfly and swam well in the consolations of both the 200 Fly and 400 IM while the "human cazoo" team captain Cathy Lech surprised the swimming world with her new improved times in the 100 Breast, 200 IM and a couple of remarkable showings in the 100 Backstroke. Sandra MacDaniel dove very well at the other end of the pool, and just missed the finals of the 1-meter event by two points.

Altogether, it was an extremely successful end to a great season and a special thanks goes out to the coaches Sheila McKirdy, Rosie McLachlan and Nelson Freedman and to the trusty manager Kim Phillips. Best of luck at the CIAU's to Diana, Janet and Eve, and congratulations to all the rest of you "wild mermaids"!

Scheuermann, Sorge carry Queen's colours

Scott Scheuermann and Steve Sorge carried the Queen's colours to Carleton last weekend to compete in the OUAA individual epee final. Both fencers qualified to compete in this tournament on the strength of their showing in the last two qualifying competitions.

The top twelve individual fencers

Deb Bradley Dawn Weberg lead gymnasts

Despite a small representation at the regional championships held at McMaster on February 11th and 12th, the Queen's gymnastics team managed to come up with an outstanding performance. The team was led by Deb Bradley (PHE80) who captured the first all round junior position averaging 7.45 per event with Dawn Weberg (PHE 80) a close second averaging 7.30 out of a field of 30 competitors.

Sandy Pryer (Arts 79) Queen's only intermediate competitor managed a consistently smooth performance on each apparatus while Lorraine Jarmen (PHE79) came up her finest showing of the year in the senior category. The CWIAA Senior National Championships will be held at the University of New Brunswick March 5th. The top seven all round seniors from this meet will represent the province of Ontario.

in Ontario were broken up into two groups of six. Each competitor had to fence the other five swordsmen in his group. The top three from each group advanced to the six man provincial final. Scheuermann advanced to the final by a strong performance, posting a 4-1 record to place second in group A. Sorge placed second in group B with a 3-2 mark to also advance to the top six.

The competition proved to be tough in the final. Scheuermann managed to beat two opponents and placed 4th. Sorge who was a beginner in September, fenced very well to place sixth in the province.

In retrospect, it was a very successful year for fencing. We saw strong performances by newcomers on both the foil and epee team. The team has great potential for an OUAA team championship next year and we wish it luck. The fencers would like to take this opportunity to thank the coaches and managers for all their help. Will we see YOU out next year?

Blind justice

Controversy in the United States is growing over the conviction of Hustler publisher, Larry Flint for portraying pornography. Flint was sentenced to a 7-15-year term by an Ohio jury. His primary defence centred on the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of speech, and questioned why his magazine was singled out for prosecution.

Already a fund for an appeal and his defence fees has been started. Critics of the decision question the wide discrepancy in the legal system that resulted in such a harsh sentence for pornography while Claudine Longet, ex-wife of singer Andy Williams, received a 30-day sentence, to be served at her discretion, for manslaughter.

Can. envoy recalled

The Canadian ambassador to Washington was recalled Tuesday in a surprise announcement. Canadian officials were puzzled by the suddenness of the announcement, particularly since it came only a week before Prime Minister Trudeau is to make an official visit to the American capital.

External Affairs Minister Donald Jamieson said Ambassador Warren is returning home at his own request. He had wanted the Washington job for a limited time only.

Mr. Warren is credited with improving Canadian relations with the State Department and with the White House, as well as improving Canada's access to U.S. legislators through direct dealing with Capitol Hill.

New Canadians

A new citizenship law inaugurated yesterday makes 1,253,000 formerly ineligible immigrants eligible to become Canadian citizens. The law reduces the residence requirement from five years to three and enables young people to obtain citizenship independently at age 18 instead of 21.

The new law also gives equal status to men and women, making both the wife of a Canadian and the husband of a Canadian eligible for Canadian citizenship in three years, instead of one year and five years respectively,

Indian treaty

The Quinze Mohawks who live near Napanee have documented repeated violations of a 999-year lease by which the reserve Indians leased 200 acres of land in 1852 to the town of Shannonville.

In return for the land the Indians are supposed to receive thirty barrels of flour per year. But in 1971 the flour received was judged unfit for human consumption and since that time no flour has been delivered to the band. In the original terms of the lease the flour was to be delivered at a certain date each year, with only a 20-day grace period to be allowed to the community. If these conditions were not fulfilled, the lease would be declared null.

The band is also upset that a cannery was built on the land, inas it was previously. Children from aboard may apply for citizenship through either parent, whereas previously only the child of a Canadian male could apply.

The special status of British subjects has also been removed. They now have to go through a citizenship court to show their eligibility instead of obtaining citizenship routinely, just by filing an application.

Vance in Israel

Cyrus Vance, U.S. Secretary of State, began his Middle East tour in Israel on Tuesday and assured the Israeli's that the United States was "deeply committed to its survival and security." Mr. Vance met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin while in Israel. The two men discussed relations between their two countries and methods of peace talks.

Vance's stop in Israel was the first in his week of travels in the Middle East; he will also be visiting Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Syria. One of his major problems in developing new peace talks among the warring countries will be how to include the Palestine Liberation Organization in the talks. Israel has refused to meet with the PLO so far, and Henry Kissinger also promised that the States would "not negotiate with the PLO so long as the PLO does not recognize Israel's right to exist."

Reed inquiry

A full scale inquiry will soon be started into Reed Paper Company's proposed expansion in the northwestern Ontario region of Ear Falls and Red Lake. The purpose of the inquiry will be to investigate the effects of the development on the Indian people in the area.

Reed Paper Co. had begun negotiations with the Ontario Government with regards to obtaining timber rights in almost 19,000 square miles of bush when Indians of the area as well as the New Democratic Party brought intense public pressure to bear on the government. This prevented Leo Bernier, then Minister of Natural Resources, from signing over the timber rights to Reed Paper as he had planned to do.

Mr. Justice Patrick Hartt of the Supreme Court of Ontario has recently been appointed by Premier William Davis to chair a hearing of the Environment Assessment Board to assess the proposed expansion of the paper company. It will take approximately two years to get details of the timber available and Reeds environmental assessment.

Judge Hartt has said that even if Reed Paper drops its expansion plans the study he will be leading will still be important. He plans "to draw up guidelines on how to deal with development in the North, where there has been no development before."

Aunt against Gandhi

Vijaya Pandit, sister of former Indian Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, and Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's aunt, has joined the campaign to remove her niece from office. Her position is expected to be a psychological blow to Mrs. Gandhi and to boost the morale of her opponents.

Mrs. Pandit was the first woman president of the United Nations General Assembly and served as Indian ambassador to Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union. She is now coming out of her nine-year retirement to campaign against "the authoritarian trend" which she feels is present in Indian politics at this time.

Guard murdered

Beverly Horner, 34-year-old and guard at the Prison for Women for ten years was murdered in her apartment at 259 Palace Road this Monday. Theresa Gagne, a 24-year-old Kingston woman, is charged with the murder.

Theresa Gagne had been living with Mrs. Horner since last summer. No one seems to know what she did for a living, and even the other apartment building residents did not know much about the two women, who kept very much to themselves.

The building janitor and Mrs. Horner's brother entered the apartment through a window on Monday and found the corpse in the midst of chaos. The telephone had been ripped out of the wall, and there was something knotted around the woman's neck which had evidently served to strangle her.

Miss Gagne was arrested early Tuesday morning in a Kingston motel. She was remanded to Quinte Regional Detention Centre in Napanee and has been charged with second degree murder.

Strange ends

A Pennsylvania woman was found dead this week after leaping from a 60-foot tower used by radio station WPPA. Her twin sister died after jumping from another of the same station's towers in December.

A woman in Alabama called the police when she suspected that an intruder was in her apartment one night. No one was found, but after the police left she discovered the burglar fast asleep under her bed.

Poll closed early, election results suspended

Court tells office holders not to leave yet

Annette Nicholson

The AMS Court will hold a public hearing Wednesday March 9, regarding the alleged early closing of the Leonard polling station during the February 9-10 elections and referendum.

Pending the decision of the hearing, at 7.30pm in the Polson Room, the results of the referendum and faculty society elections are suspended. Acclamations are not affected.

The Court has requested that those people who were due to give up office as a result of the elections, continue in office.

The Court decided Wednesday night to expand its inquiry to consider the elections procedures generally, instead of focussing on the specific violation at the Leonard station. Mike Yearsley, Chief Justice, He said "the culprit is the system" He acknowledged that "you can't run a perfect election but some of these things should be looked into."

To assist the inquiry, the Court requests that anyone with specific information about the early closing appear at the hearing. The Court also invites representations with respect to general election procedures.

The results of the two referendum questions regarding differential tuition fees and Queen's members in the National Union of Students, both of which were very close, the latter motion losing by a margin of 20 votes, could have been affected by the early closing.

Although the Court's jurisdiction regarding faculty society elections is subject to doubt (the societies have their own regulations and returning officers), the Court will exercise jurisdiction over procedures.

May do it all again

Students with knowledge of the early closing of the AMS election poll in the Leonard Hall cafeteria have been requested by the AMS Chief Justice Mike Yearsley to come to a public hearing next Wednesday in the Polson room of the SMU.

Outgoing Exec. sums up 1976-7, planning urged

Anne Johnson

"This was a year of consolidation and not expansion," said Jamie Avis, outgoing AMS President at the AMS General Meeting on Tuesday night. Referring to 1975-76 as "the year of the shuffle," because of the many resignations and shuffled positions within the AMS, Avis said that it had been damaging to the organization as a whole. He added that one objective for his term of office had been to stabilize the situation and not to branch out into new programs.

Avis pointed out that the AMS was currently in a sound financial position with a surplus of over $200,000. Since the AMS is supposed to be a non-profit organization, Avis said that a creative use of this money should now be endeavoured. Avis added, however, that when a service is run to break even, "it is very difficult not to make money," and he cited the pub as a perfect example.

Paul Steep, former Vice-President (Operations) recommended in his report that there should be more long-range financial planning. Although realizing the difficulties of this in view of a relatively short term of office, Steep said that this type of planning is desperately needed. Steep also stressed that "a thorough financial review of the AMS is needed," as well as "a hard look at an executive that is not allowed to alter its full-time student status."

Later in the meeting, a motion was brought forward concerning the efficacy of an AMS executive member concurrently holding another major position on campus. The New Outer Council member Gerry

Chevron evicted, retake office: fight goes on

WATERLOO [CUP]—Three staff members from the University of Waterloo's unofficial student newspaper were evicted from the paper's offices Feb. 27 but later reoccupied it with the help of other staff members.

One of the evictors, student federation president Doug Thompson, said he received a "thorough pummelling" during the reoccupation but Free Chevron spokesperson said the only person hurt was a staff member when he was dragged from the office by a group of federation councillors.

The incident is the latest in the dispute over control of the paper, which was shut down in September by the Federation amidst claims the Chevron was being taken over by a campus political group.

Since then, the paper's office has been occupied around the clock by former Chevron staffers and supporters who publish the weekly Free Chevron.

Former federation president Shane Roberts, who instigated the paper's shutdown, was thrown out of office in December by a student petition and the Federation's subsequent attempt to evict the staff by legal means was quashed by the Ontario Supreme Court recently.

Federation vice-president Ron Hipfner admitted Feb. 28 some federation members were planning a "raid" on the occupied office March 1 using force if necessary, but decided instead to take action Feb. 27.

"We decided we'd have to use force in the near future to get them out of the office," Hipfner said. "We had planned the raid for the Tuesday (Student's) general meeting. Then 12 of us decided to go down for a tour that night (Feb. 27) about 8 p.m."

Hipfner said the group found three staffers in the office and that two of them left when asked to. The third "put up a fight" and was removed from the office, he said.

Thompson, who was present at the eviction, said that when a group of about 40 Free Chevron supporters showed up to retake the locked office, "seven or eight of them gave me a rather thorough pummelling." However, Thompson said he doesn't plan to lay charges.

But Free Chevron spokesperson Neil Docherty said Feb. 28 there was "definitely no violence when we took the office."

"We deny (allegations of violence) categorically," he said. Docherty said the Free Chevron staffer dragged from the office was not seriously injured, suffering only abrasions on his arm.

Docherty, Free Chevron editor Larry Hannant, and staffer Henry Hess were ordered Feb. 28 by an Ontario judge to post a $200 bond and keep the peace after Roberts successfully pressed assault charges against the trio. The charges arose from an incident last year in which Roberts tried to remove a typewriter from the paper's office.

Although ordered to post the bond, the Free Chevron staffers were not convicted by the court of any wrongdoing.

A federation executive member was convicted earlier this year for mischief after he threw a rock through a window of the Free Chevron office, narrowly missing a staff member.

Thompson met with Free Chevron representatives Feb. 27 in an effort to resolve the dispute. The paper's staff had promised to reply by March 3 to an offer of negotiation. Since the Sunday incident, however, "It's hard to take Thompson seriously," Docherty said.

"Thompson is trying to mobilize the right wing on campus," he said. "The next time they come down (to the office), if there's a lot of people there, I don't know what's going to happen."

Roberts and other federation executive members shut the Chevron down in September after they claimed it was being taken over by a campus political group, the Anti-Imperialist Alliance, which is associated with the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist).

Both Docherty and Hannant are supporters of the CPC (M-L), but say this does not constitute a takeover of the paper, and point out the federation has never offered proof of its charges.

Free Chevron staffers have adamantly refused any offer to investigate the situation until two fired paid staff members of the Chevron are rehired with backpay and the paper reinstated to its original status.

Correction

In the Friday, Feb. 18 edition of the Journal it was incorrectly reported that John Ryder-Burbidge was the President of the Queen's P.C. Club. Mr. Ryder-Burbidge is the Policy Chairman of the association.

Senate notes by Paul Finkle

Five Universities have not yet formally implemented differential fees and four others have resolutions pending before their respective Senates calling for reconsideration of implementation by Governing Boards.

Mr. A. Marshall, reporting to Senate on the proceedings of the Council of Universities said the issue of visa students "continued to draw most discussion." Queen's Senate decision to adopt the fee increases is considered to be in accordance with advice given by COV.

Principal Watts, reporting on the latest meeting of the Board of Trustees said that implementation of the $100 increase in the standard formula has been approved. Also approved was the continuation of the Institute of Local Government and the Centre for Resource Studies as well as new student awards in Engineering, Medicine, English and Canadian History.

Queen's tentative revenue for next year's operating budget is $56.6 million dollars, an 8.6 percent increase from this year.

Despite the increase, Principal Watts told Senate that it is "crystal clear to me" that this will remain an extremely tight budget and that "some very hard choices" will need to be made. Principal Watts alluded to the 30 percent rise in PUC rates, the increase in operating expenses of areas such as the library and pressure of inflation on salaries, when setting the increase in revenue in perspective.

Members of the Nominating Committee will now be selected from among second and third year senators, and members will be appointed on a rotating basis for two year terms. The previous policy of choosing only final year senators did not allow for continuity in the elected membership from year to year thus handicapping the efforts of the Committee.

Senate disapproves of abridgement of rights

by Paul Finkel

Citing "the responsibility of the University to support actively the principle of academic freedom," the Senate passed a motion at its February meeting expressing its disapproval with the Government's decision to deny Prof. Gunder-Frank's entry into Canada.

It called the Immigration Department's action an "inadequately explained abridgement of our rights as citizens and members of the academic community to the free, open and peaceful circulation of ideas and information."

Also expressed was "strong public concern about the arbitrary use of the criterion of national security."

The Third World Symposium at which Prof. Gunder-Frank was to speak has been cancelled due to the withdrawal of other speakers in protest (see story below).

Members of the Queen's community including Principal Watts and the AMS have written to Bud Cullen and the Prime Minister expressing their concern at the Government's decision. Bearing in mind the large number of letters of protest sent thus far some members of the Senate express concern about the effectiveness of the motion before them. Support for the motion was not unanimous and a suggestion that copies of the Senate decision be sent to international bodies as well as the Canadian government was rejected.

Growth, development possible for Kingston

By Maben Smith

Ontario Treasurer Darcy McKeough envisages great things for Eastern Ontario, but it is up to business, the labour community and local leaders to do their part.

Mr. McKeough was speaking at a joint luncheon held last week by the Kingston Chamber of Commerce and the Kingston Rotary Club. The subject was "Growth in Eastern Ontario." He did little more than reiterate his "Go-East" policy that he is pursuing. Businessmen heard more of the elements attached to growth, but little of the growth itself.

McKeough stated that he "believed growth and development could be encouraged without undermining and diminishing the quality of life in this area."

The Treasurer also spoke of the Provincial Government's decentralization policy. Kingston, London, Ottawa and Thunder Bay have all been named regional centres in the hope that an added incentive existed for developers to locate out of the golden horseshoe (Toronto-Hamilton corridor). For Eastern Ontario, the outlook for growth and development was particularly promising.

"No student is forced to borrow in order to qualify for a grant."

The new program, proposed by the Committee would be known as the Optional Loan and Need Tested Grant (OLANG) and would replace the present Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP). If the recommendations suggested in the report are adopted by the provincial government, Ontario would pull out of the present Canada Student Loan Program. Student loans would then be guaranteed by the province as opposed to the federal government as is presently the case.

The new program, OLANG, is intended to increase the accessibility of post-secondary education to students from low income backgrounds. "The chief vehicle for this redistribution would be the grant reduction factor. This factor would be used to derive the amount of grant based on parental income. The grant reduction would be based on rising net family income above $1,000. Starting at 2 1/2 percent at $1,000, the grant reduction factor increases by 1/4 percent for each $100 of net income. Therefore, for a person applying from a family with a net income of $9,500, the grant reduction factor would be $2,232.50 or 23.5 percent. For a person applying from a family with a net income of $20,500, the grant reduction factor would be $10,455, irrespective of how many children were attending post-secondary school.

Other changes from the present OSAP program would be that the minimum student contribution of $500 would be required of all grant recipients. At present OSAP establishes the amount at $384. Former NDP Education critic, David Warner pointed out that under the Ontario government's Experience 77 program whereby students make $106-120 per week for seven weeks, they would only make up to $840 of which they would be expected to contribute $500 towards their education.

Another major facet of the OLANG proposal is to change the Group B, independent status offered by OSAP. Quoting from the Report, "To qualify as the equivalent of the current Group B

Gunder-Frank protest

by Deb Sigler

The organizers of the Third World Conference will meet on Friday to read a statement protesting the government's refusal to admit Marxist theorist Andre Gunder-Frank to Canada, for alleged security reasons. The conference was cancelled as a protest of the government action.

Those participating in the drafting of the statement include Professors Varga, Hermann, and Leys of Queen's and Doctors Judith Helman and John Saul from York. As well, Professors Tom Naylor and Kari Levitt of McGill University will be sending a prepared statement to aid in the draft preparation.

The meeting will be held in Mackintosh-Corry D214 on Friday March 4. "We will be trying to make an effective statement about the government decision, which we will present to the media," said professor Leys. Following the reading of the draft, there will be an open question period and discussion.

Ambassador Warren will speak at Queen's

Environmental issues of great importance to Canada and the United States will be discussed by Canadian Ambassador, Jake Warren, when he speaks at Queen's University, Wednesday, March 9 at 8 p.m. in Stirling Hall D.

Canada's Ambassador to the United States since July 1975, Mr. Warren is a highly-regarded civil servant, credited with improving Canada's relations with the State Department and with the White House.

Before his Washington posting, Mr. Warren was Canada's High Commissioner in London for four years. During his 30 years of public service he has been Canada's representative to the International Monetary Fund, the Organization for European Economic Co-operation and NATO; chairman of CATT's (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) Council of Representatives and Contracting Parties and deputy minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In 1974 Mr. Warren was honored by his Alma Mater, Queen's University, with an honorary doctor of laws degree.

(Working) student, a student must have been employed for three years rather than the current two or one depending on specified circumstances, thereby demonstrating a serious attachment to the labour force."

Dissenting Opinion

One member of the Committee, Paul Axelrod, a graduate student at York University wrote "A statement of Reservations" appended to the Report. One of the criticisms extended by Axelrod was that the Report did not analyse the effect of student assistance programs or the accessibility of students to higher education in Ontario. Other criticisms were that the Report was "too sanguine about the ability of students to repay heavy loans" and that "OLANG is of limited value to independent, single graduate students who receive no other financial aid."

The only under graduate student on the Committee, Timothy Doyle of the University of Windsor refused to sign the Report.

The co-chairmen of the committee were Dr. Stefan Dupre and Mr. Norman Sisco, and other members were James Fisher, partner, The Canada Consulting Group;

Ms. Frances Flanagan, Cornwall director of social services; Ms. Joan Macdonald, director of nursing, College of Nurses of Ontario; and Patrick Phillips director of student awards, University of Toronto. Dr. Dupre is chairman of Ontario Council on University Affairs and Mr. Sisco is chairman of the Ontario Council of Regents for Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology.

Minister of Colleges and Universities, Harry Parrott, in an interview with the Journal, referring to the Report imparted, "I don't think they dotted their 'i's' and crossed their 't's'."

Parrott went on to stress that his government, "must think of all the ramifications" of OLANG, especially in terms of the recommendations to opt out of the Canada Student Loans Plan (CSL). The Minister was concerned about the future of CSL should Ontario pull out as it would mean that Canada's two largest provinces were not part of a supposedly national scheme.

Should the government decide to implement the program it would, according to Parrott, take my "greatest effort to get it in operation for 78-79."

New civil liberties association in Kingston

by Tim Oberlander

An interest shown by both students and members of the community towards civil liberties in Kingston has resulted in the formation of a local human rights association. This action follows an organizational meeting held on February 15. At present, the newly formed group is not affiliated with a major civil rights organization, said Professor S. Ryan of Queen's Law School. As a local group, though, they hope to enlist the greater resources of other larger organizations in particular situations.

The main concerns of the group, Ryan outlined, would include human rights of prisoners here in Kingston and problems arising from immigration. In addition he stressed that the group is committed to the implementation of an international covenant on civil liberties, to which Canada has now become party.

In May, 1976, Canada signed two international covenants, one dealing with civil and political rights and the other dealing with economic and social rights. "Canada has now assumed two obligations", Ryan said, and concluded by saying that we must now realize the goals of the two agreements. Prof. Ryan said that action should be taken to legislate the protection of civil rights, and thus provide effective legal protection against violations. "We proclaim rights but we fail to provide remedies for violations".

Professor Ryan sees the role of his group as promoting and implementing the aspirations of the covenants. By bringing the issues into public view, Ryan hopes that new effective civil rights legislation will result both at the federal and provincial levels. Ryan also hopes the Kingston group will illustrate civil rights issues around the world. Ryan is optimistic "that now we exist, cases will be brought to us" which are not usually exposed without such a civil liberties association.

The next meeting of the civil liberties group will be held on March 15, at a location which is yet to be determined. For more information please contact Professor Ryan or Professor Swan at 547-5860.

Big bucks for student jobs

by Tim Greenwood

Jack Granatstein, of York University, will be speaking Tuesday March 8 on "Accommodating to Empire: Canadian-American relations, 1947 to 1949". He will look at the free trade negotiations of 1947-48 and Canada's attempt to share in the benefits of the Marshall Plan. He will discuss the implications of these developments.

Granatstein is the author of numerous books and articles including The Politics of Survival: The Conservative Party 1939-1945, Canada's War 1939-1945 and, recently released, The Politics of the MacKenzie King Government 1939-1945.

He is the book review editor of Canadian Forum, and a contributor to the Canadian Annual Review, a report on the developments in Canadian Politics.

Granatstein has recently been involved in the debate, on the editorial pages of the Globe and Mail, between popular and academic historians.

The lecture will be held at 7:30 in Watson Hall Room 517.

The Ontario government will spend 14 million dollars to create approximately 10,400 summer jobs through a special summer employment program, "Ontario Experience '77". This was recently announced by Terry Jones, Parliamentary Assistant to the Honourable Margaret Birch, responsible for the Ontario Youth Secretariat.

"Ontario Experience '77", larger than the program of past years has grown from 40 to 63 components. Mr. Jones said that "the increase in the program's overall size is in response to the needs of the many young people who will be looking for employment this summer. Last summer the youth unemployment reached 13.7 percent."

The program is vitally concerned with the development of student job opportunities in the areas of the province where youth unemployment is most severe, and will act in co-operation with established community agencies like local municipalities, conservation authorities, school boards, travel associations, libraries and museums. Mr. Jones stated that "this policy has been adopted to ensure that "Ontario Experience '77" programs are responsive to local concerns and priorities. The program allows community agencies to complement many of their services, while at the same time providing students with a meaningful work experience."

The program provides positions to complement a young person's academic and career interests and Mr. Jones stressed that in many cases students would be able to directly apply what they are learning in school to their summer jobs.

The range of jobs offered encompasses such fields as law, commerce, labour, agriculture, tourism, recreation, culture, environment and social service.

The Ontario Youth Secretariat has prepared a booklet on "Ontario Experience '77" complete with a program application form. The booklet has been distributed to schools throughout the province and may also be obtained by writing Ontario Experience '77, Queen's Park, Toronto.

Journal interview with Keith Norton and Flora Macdonald

Kingston's representatives urge Gov't decentralization

by Giles Gherson

Flora MacDonald has committed herself to the fight for the maintenance of Confederation. Notwithstanding the barrier presented by a Quebec government, "whose mind is closed" on the separatist issue, she conveyed her determination to take her message of the benefits of Confederation to the people of that province, a large proportion of which, in her view, retain an open mind on the issue.

Discussing her firm belief in a strong Confederation incorporating Quebec and recognizing the French fact, Miss MacDonald pointed to the Constitutional guarantee of biculturalism in Canada as the basis on the prevailing ethnic mosaic of this country. One of the abiding characteristics of the country, she suggested is that "diversity flourishes". Yet she conceded the glamour of the separatist argument to Quebecers in the sense that it is perceived as a "tremendously exciting objective to obtain". Thus she defined the task of all supporters of Confederation as one of making that system "equally exciting". However, she emphasized that any appeal to the people of Quebec must not merely be emotionally compelling, but also be geared towards a forceful and well-researched portrayal of the economic, social and cultural benefits of Confederation. In this regard she commended the government appointment of Paul Tellier to head a Federal-Provincial Relations office designed to "begin this kind of coordination effort of all those who believe in federalism".

In considering the present condition of Confederation, Miss MacDonald put forward the suggestion that regional chauvinism might have an "adverse" effect on its well-being by having contributed to certain tensions. Noting an "escalating trend", she felt that regional grievances run the risk of outweighing the national commitment.

On the other hand Miss MacDonald does not discount the regional discontent in Canada. "Frequently national programmes, centrally conceived, don't suit certain regions" she said. Thus she didn't find it surprising that provincial governments are seeking more power to deal with regional problems.

Mr. Norton was perhaps more forceful on the issue of decentralization of powers. "Realistically a central government, dominated by central provinces, is not equipped to deal with regional differences." He took the issue one step further by contending that municipal governments, as "the governments closest to the people" should be invested with more power to ensure less of a dichotomy between the policy priorities of the people and their government.

Neither Miss MacDonald nor Mr. Norton thought that greater decentralization implied "a balkanization" effect on the standards of services offered across Canada. Yet, reflecting perhaps the different levels of government at which they respectively represent this constituency, they were at odds as to the extent of decentralization required. Whereas Mr. Norton staunchly advocated the setting of priorities at the provincial level, Miss MacDonald expressed adamance that national standards in post-secondary education and medicare not be relinquished.

Pursuing the theme that Confederation implies an exercise in mutual understanding, Miss MacDonald noted the importance that Canadians be able to appreciate the different regions of their country. She lamented the fact that current Federal Government policy was somewhat remiss in this area. For instance, she observed that due to the air transportation price structure, it is currently cheaper to travel abroad than in Canada.

editorial opinion

A fiasco in Waterloo

After months of attempts resolving the Chevron problem at Waterloo, the time has come to close the case. Debate has carried on since September as to whether the Student Federation should have closed the newspaper, as it did without an investigation, on the grounds that the Chevron had been taken over by the members of the Anti-Imperialist Alliance, an affiliate of the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) who were seen as attempting to foist a political viewpoint on the students. The Chevron countered with the publication of the Free Chevron, a biased and political medium used to demand the reinstatement and investigation of the Chevron and its situation respectively.

Shane Roberts, former president of the Student Federation, was removed from office shortly after Christmas over the issue. The Waterloo students rejected the present Free Chevron in an admittedly poorly worded referendum by the overwhelming margin of ten to one. They sided neither with the Federation and its high-handed tactics nor the Chevron in its militant struggle. CUP got into the act by initially offering financial support for the Free Chevron, recognizing the Free Chevron as the official Chevron (the student government started producing the Real Chevron, for want of a better name) and later offered several times, and actually began, to investigate just what was going on.

Recently, it has evolved, the Chevron staff has rejected the investigation by CUP into the situation. For various reasons, they stubbornly refuse to allow any investigation to take place until after the paper has been reinstated. The Chevron Editor maintains that an investigation would lend some legitimacy to the Federation's actions.

Finally, last weekend, after reoccupation of the Chevron office by members of the Student Federation and after members of the Chevron staff gained access, the new President of the Student Federation was beaten by some of the journalists. Earlier, a Chevron staff member was hurt while being evicted.

These antics have gone on for too long. Neither the students nor their representatives want the Free Chevron reinstated as demanded. The time has come for the Free Chevron to admit defeat. As publisher of the paper, the Student Federation was legally quite within its right to terminate the publication of its newspaper for whatever reason. From an ethical point of view, however, this action was a deplorable disgrace. It is, unfortunately, merely a matter of time before a proper court injunction can be secured to have police eject the Free Chevron staff from the office.

It is obvious that the Student Federation cannot be trusted to uphold the CUP principles to which they supposedly subscribe. For its part, CUP would be well advised to refuse to readmit the publisher of any newspaper at UW until such time as an autonomous and incorporated student newspaper is established at the University of Waterloo.

He may age quite a bit, but he'll graduate

by Jim Klein

In first year most students live in residence and so are treated to the spectacle of the Early Graduate—a student who by choice or force of circumstance, leaves the university well before the academic year is through. I remember the first "quitter" that I knew, way back when. He was an upper-year student, with good marks, who left Queen's when he discovered that he had a terminal illness.

I thought it strange then that he would rather spend his remaining months elsewhere, but thought no more of him until a few weeks ago. No, he didn't survive miraculously—it's not of him that I write, in fact.

I remembered him, though, when I met another friend at another university who wanted to quit. This friend had no academic pressures and is in fact a few months from a graduation near the top of his class. He's not dying, either. He's just aging fast.

John's disease is an academic one, and I noticed the first symptoms last term. When I saw him he was settling into a protracted bout with listlessness, made up of disrespect for all he had accomplished in three-plus years and apathy for all he would be asked to do yet. He had told me as early as last summer that he foresaw a competition between "a grinder's graduation"—the fruit of four years of agreeing with instructors while reaping respectability (and an extra half-grade or so) from well-placed but basically semantic objections on minor points—and a burgeoning desire to have his say, even to the point of labelling half a term's work "bullshit". In November, graduation, respectability, and good grad-school prospects were quickly losing the rule to ennui John's attitude, with six months to go, didn't make much sense.

Most people told him so, too. "John, it doesn't make sense to raise shit so close to graduation."

Well earned praise

There was a well deserved standing ovation given to Messrs. Avis, Steep and Ms. Wood at the AMS General Meeting last Tuesday night. They have represented the students' interests well throughout their term of office.

It was a philosophical year for them - few scandals occupied Outer Council's time. There was none of the secretive politicking evident in previous administration. Discussion revolved around the issues of free tuition, differential tuition fees for foreign students, AMS support for various consumer groups, the official expression of outrage at a variety of government actions, et cetera.

A boring year? Perhaps. But let's face it - Today's AMS is not exciting. The Executive has a dual function: to maintain the quality of services provided by the organization (Queen's students are wanting of little by way of services) and to represent students to the administrators of Queen's and the Province.

In both of these roles the outgoing Executive, with the Commissioners and the QSA Director, have done admirably in handling the formidable volume of thankless work involved.

budding during a February thaw, looked promptly to John.

He neither knew nor cared, and I appreciated his response all the more for knowing what he was feeling. John stared abstractly at a nearby lithograph (to look like he was thinking). Then he looked downward, to gather more credibility by appearing humble, and lied, "Sunspot activity....I read it the other day."

John later told me he was originally tempted to say it was God's will, but didn't feel like being laughed at. I could somehow understand that he felt like a joke of several years length was waiting for him to say the punch line. For a scientist, a mystical if untrue answer (and an inward smirk) beats the hell out of ignorance and ridicule.

John had a small laugh that day. I didn't seem to do much to dispel that feeling of being fooled which, if the disease runs its normal course, will eat away at him for a few years yet.

Promote Health

by Lauraine Goguen

The philosophy of Nursing 327 is health promotion. Our focus is on assessment of nursing and health needs of the family throughout the maternity cycle and pre-natal period, and of children from infancy through adolescence. Our experiences encompass many areas: 60 hours of obstetrics is spent at KGH, in labour and delivery and in post-partum nursing. A family is followed into the community and assisted in their period of adjustment. We also have the opportunity to attend either a prenatal class or obstetric clinic. Child care experience is gained mainly in the community: at nursery schools, child development clinics, doctor's and dentist's offices, tutoring school age children, participating in Brownies or Cub groups, working with adolescents. . . . The 327 Nurse is involved in health promotion. She is able to move from highly specialized hospital areas and extend her knowledge and skills to community settings.

by Howard Smith

I was browsing through a newsstand the other day. Succumbing to an old "bad habit", I reached for the most lewd looking nudie mag. and flipped through it. It sounds a good deal easier than it really is, this "perving". One can never look too interested for fear that your best friend's mother is in the store spying on you through the shelves, all the time suffering from twitching face at such an outrageous display of depravity. Thus one must flip through the pages nonchalantly, looking generally bored, perhaps whistling a hymn now and then to throw off suspicion. An occasional chuckle is a good coverup because people think you're reading the jokes. Similarly a stifled exclamation to the effect that this edition has a real live interview with King Kong's brother goes a long way to convince passersby that your intentions are really intellectual. Concealing your Penthouse magazine in an upside down copy of "Field and Stream", unfolding the life size pin up, panting loudly and frothing at the mouth are, however, dead-giveaways and should be avoided if you don't want people to be sure of your real objectives.

The purpose of the foregoing parody of a sex-crazed maniac is not really to make a funny. More so, it's to make a point.

We live in a society most adept at transforming simple features of life into colossal problems. The western cover-up syndrome effectively deprives the average person of satisfaction of his natural curiosity about human bodies to the extent that a multi-million dollar industry flourishes selling us back in small doses as basic a piece of information as how a nude adult person of the opposite sex looks. Fold in certain religions and legal rules and you have the majority believing that there is something shameful, lewd, sinful or immoral about the human form. Yet if one takes a moment to watch a child, one discovers no shame or bashfulness about nudity until such values are drummed into him/her by "heavy" inference. People change behind closed doors, scold when Dick or Jane run under the sprinkler "au naturel" and frown when the kids talk of such things. The result is western society where the sensibilities have been known to be stunned by the sight of a woman's kneecap or a man's hairy chest.

The "modern" forum is more "enlightened" - nudity is a sport for nudists and perverted visitors to Vancouver's Rec beach; it is a business to the likes of Hugh Hefner.

Had we the sense to recognize that there is no need for the degree of "modesty" we perpetuate, there could be little market in the business of body graphics.

"Pornography" in a "sexploitation" sense is a function of our values, it is these values, not the books on the magazine stand that are really sick.

Quebec in focus

PQ gathering funds folks for referendum

by David L. McColm

The Parti Quebecois has set the forest ablaze. They have named a seven-member committee to prepare to party's strategy for the upcoming referendum on Quebec independence. Plans for a $12 million fund-raising drive for this campaign have also been discussed. The party shouldn't have any trouble raising this money since party membership has increased 45 per cent since the Nov. 15 election. Membership now stands at 138,000.

A new movement to 'save Canada' has been established - the Quebec-Canada movement. Michel Gratton, Liberal MNA for Gatineau, and founder of the movement estimated Quebec-Canada had 10,000 members across the province with an additional 50,000 membership applications in circulation. Mr. Gratton estimates French-speaking membership to be 60 per cent.

The movement is trying to persuade Quebecers to vote against independence in the referendum. It would also like to see the referendum held as soon as possible.

The movement will be financed by membership fees, pins, bumper stickers, as well as by contributions from sympathetic individuals all over the United States and Canada.

Mr. Gratton has said membership is restricted to Quebecers - "in other words those who will have the right to vote in the upcoming referendum."

As I see it, this is the one fault with the movement as it now stands. Why limit membership to Quebecers? Why not allow the rest of Canada the chance to express its desire to see a united Canada. After all it wouldn't be hard to keep track of the number of Quebecers versus non-Quebecers involved in the movement. By showing Quebec residents the rest of Canada does 'give a damn', aren't they more likely to vote in favour of a united Canada?

Realistically though, the movement is a child, as yet, 'unborn'. There has been talk of expanding to the rest of Canada, but only once everything in Quebec was under firm leadership and on steady ground. This makes sense since who would want to see our child become stillborn?

There is a chance that a non-Quebec organization (possibly entitled "Friends of the Quebec Canada Movement") will be getting off the ground soon with the same goal as Michel Gratton's organization. In any event, let's hope that the movement does eventually become, like the name says, a Quebec Canada movement.

This movement can do nothing but succeed and with its success the dream of the Parti Quebecois for an independent Quebec will slowly fade into oblivion. But Rene Levesque is not one who takes defeat lightly. He shocked himself by winning the election and he will accordingly shock the world through his obstinate desire for independence.

Only to be a promise

Dear Editor:

I would like to draw attention to a rumour (fact or promise?) that was circulating around the campus last fall term, but which seems to have become forgotten. The issue in question is that concerning a second campus pub.

Many students were led to believe that an alternative to the Underground would become available before Christmas and that it would be no more than a 'quiet' pub. By 'quiet', I assumed a watering-hole where people could get together, talk, have a beer and maybe listen to some background music.

Whatever happened to this fantastic idea? Did the AMS let us down in their obligations? I really can't believe that there would be much trouble in filling it and thus making it an economically viable proposition. After all, ask those standing in Queen's only 'drinking line-up' who are hoping to make it to a seat before an elapsed time of two hours.

My only regret is that nothing was ever done about this. It may be too late to relieve the present Underground's overflow for this year, but the need for a second pub is definitely a real one (if only to provide a service on the more popular nights of Thursday, Friday and Saturday). I think the AMS owes its student body an explanation telling us why the 'Un-Line-up' never came about and what plans it has for the future development of such an establishment.

letters 'Criminal' treatment

Dear Editor:

As far as drinking places go, the Queen's Pub is considered one of the better bars in Kingston (at least as far as elitist theory can be taken). However, there are certain policies perpetrated by the AMS constabulary which treat the student population as being a slight cut above the common criminal.

My friends and I frequent the Pub in search of relaxation and conversation. To have this mood shattered by the unlawful frisking of patrons as they leave the establishment is a black mark upon the concepts of liberal freedom and lawfulness (two notions integral to the ideology perpetrated by the Queen's institution). Such activity is also inimicable to basic principles of common law as they are interpreted in Canada. To assume that each patron as he leaves the premises is a potential thief is a slur against the student body-at-large.

We had the misfortune of dueling with the police state tactics of arbitrary and illegal search upon our exit from the Pub last week. These tactics not only rubbed us the wrong way, but more importantly, were a breach of the law instigated by self-appointed guardians of Queen's Whiggery.

Our particular nemesis was simply following orders, however, it is these orders, rather than the individual, that prove objectionable to us. These activities serve only to reflect the arrogant and unthinking attitudes displayed by the AMS. Any policy that ignores the dictates of common courtesy, common sense and common law is open to serious question indeed. AMS search policy reflects tactics so high handed that they would only be considered by the most oppressive and inept police force in Brazil. We respectfully submit that the entire AMS constabulary resign, commit suicide or at least extend a formal apology in front of the entire university. We demand that the AMS clarify its policy beyond doubt with regards to this stratum of confrontation. We request responses from other concerned students who see the inherent contradiction between the AMS and common law and the capitalist system in general.

'Constables don't make rules'

Dear Editor:

As the year has progressed, I have noticed a growing deterioration in the acceptance of AMS Constables on Campus. This is sad to observe, since relationships with any authority, particularly in a college community, tend to be strained. The over-used cliché has been that most of the force are power trippers whose main reason for wanting the job is to raise themselves above other students and bask in the glory. Is the process of getting verbally abused by indignant, intoxicated fools well after last call, simply for enforcing pub policy and Ontario liquor laws a form a power tripping? If this is true, then every constable on the force has been guilty of this accusation every time they have worked the pub. Is the use of tolerance and restraint when faced with ignorance and animosity a form of power tripping? If this is correct, then the constables are once again, guilty as charged.

The new pub has brought with its existence many problems which I feel have damaged the image of the force. Constables do not have secret desires to frisk people for mugs, or unnatural urges to spend a frigid evening in the line-up simply for the pleasure of depriving people of their sustenance. We do not make the rules, but we have been entrusted to enforce them to the best of our ability.

In my capacity as constable, I have met countless numbers of people.

Many have become friends, because, right from the start they have realized that I am a constable with certain duties, not an abominable ogre attempting to destroy merriment.

The power tripping image which has been growing is not helped by any mention in the school papers, which depict constables as power hungry thugs; a recent example is in Petruzzella's column in the February 9 issue of Golden Words, where there were two references to the force showing a strong negative bias (this article finally drove me to write this letter). Even the Who's Who does not do the force justice, with an article entitled "AMS Constables Are Not Fascists". This yearly blurb implies that constables should not be hated (damned decent of them).

Finally, as I stated earlier, it is a normal reaction to reject the representatives of any authority. In my occasional off-duty hours spent at the pub, I have been riled by some of the constables, but I realize that it is the alcohol and not the AMS which is buring my blood. Most people realize this fact, and if everyone would, then good times can be had by all. These reflections are not the view of the force, but just those of one constable who is tired of being considered a pig.

Article was 'distorted'

Dear Editor:
Having read Gerry Lewarne's article (Feb. 11) about the address of Mr. Enders, we found only the most tenuous connection between the description and the events which transpired. Were it not for the accompanying picture, the article could well have described an entirely different event.

Frank editorial

Dear Editor:
It was refreshing to read your frank and balanced editorial on the activities of the AMS Leadership following the visit of Thomas Enders. The moral myopia of Messrs. Avis and Christie is a cause for some concern, to put it mildly. I think we have to recognize that middle class etiquette is not always compatible with the expression of moral outrage. Curiously enough, it seems characteristic of doctrinaire conservatism to cloak its opposition to the moral content of an outrage in the form of a superficial criticism of the breach of etiquette.

Sincerely,
Henry Laycock,
Associate Professor.

Outlook seeks pledged money

Dear Editor:
It has been over 5 weeks since Camp Outlook held its Dance Marathon to raise money. The return of pledges is slowing down and yet only about half of the people who went to the Danceathon have turned in their money.

The Danceathon is our major fund raising event. Lots of people from Outlook put a lot of work into the dance, and we feel it was a success. However, it cannot truly be termed one if we don't get our pledges!

Pledge money should be turned in to the Outlook office - up the stairs in the University Ave entrance to the Union - as soon as possible.

Thanks very much,
Susan McDougall, Danceathon Coordinator

P.S. If you pledged someone and he/she has not yet approached you for the money - please approach him/her instead!

'Red' feminism

Check under the bed

by Richard Harris

Over the last decade or so, an increasing number of people, both men and women, have been asking some rather curious questions about the role of women in our society. Now it is clear that many of these people are simply cranks, misguided social and sexual misfits whose position in any healthy society would be at best marginal. Some, for example, and one was allowed to speak at Queen's recently, seem to believe that women should not enjoy a good fuck. Fortunately, most women are sufficiently sensitive to the needs of their men that they are not taken in by this twaddle.

There are others, however, who have become involved in the women's movement for more sinister reasons. I would not burden you with this unsavoury fact except that I believe it is the height of folly to close our eyes to the deviants in our midst. Some of the latter are sufficiently ill-judged actually to call themselves Socialists. In that case, of course, no-one listens to them. This happened recently at Queen's when the Socialists got up and said that, all things considered, they did not think that Mr. Enders was a jolly good fellow. This was obviously ridiculous and too ideological to convince anyone.

Unfortunately, not everyone associated with the women's movement is so obviously red, and hence it is difficult simply to dismiss their arguments out of hand. People (your best friend may be one) often pick up the ideas of these radicals from our liberal press without ever realizing their implications. The effect on our society is both insidious and potentially disastrous. With this in mind I thought I should introduce you to the socialist argument in order that you can be on your guard at all times. But be careful, these ideas can warp your mind, as they have the minds of many of our women.

Why are some of our women upset? At first sight it might appear to be the result of the emancipation of women, our uniformly excellent higher education system, and our universal experience of free speech, all of which encourages people to complain even if they lack real cause. (Sometimes I wonder if a little less of these things wouldn't do us a lot of good!) This is, I am sure, as appealing an explanation to you as it is to me. It is with some diffidence, therefore, that I ask is it enough? It might be pointed out, for example, that our liberal society took rather a long time to get around to some of these things, as it is only now beginning to get around to the issue of equal pay.

Our socialist brothers have a glib answer to that one. They say that it was not in the interests of capitalists (that quaint phrase!) in the nineteenth century to support, encourage or otherwise permit the emancipation of women, giving them equal pay, equal rights and so on. They claim that the main reason the capitalists can better afford to pay women in our society a decent wage is that they can now exploit labour (including the labour of women) in the developing world. Now I am sure that you do not need me to point out that this is a biased, false, inconsistent, warped and ideological view which was only true in the nineteenth century when there were just a few nasty greedy capitalists around and we're lucky that today all the capitalists are nice because now they're businessmen and anyway the Federal Government controls all their excess profits (doesn't it?). Are you following me?

The socialists, who never learn, say things haven't changed that much. Well now, that's obviously not true. Women today have cars, vaginal deodorants and washing machines, coffee grinders and sanitary napkins. Hell, they even have Playgirl! What more could they want? I hear you ask. What indeed!

It is in this fashion that I suggest you refute the arguments of your friends (as they may appear) when this question comes up. Don't forget, they may be hiding under your bed right now. And some of them will be women!

Manitoban challenges 'troublemaker-pinkos'

Dear Editor,

Congratulations to the high proportion of students at Queen's who listened courteously to Thomas Enders, US Ambassador to Canada, recently. Having heard his views one can then disagree or ask questions for clarification. At least such freedom of speech and choice we have to some extent here!

To the troublemaker-pinkos, aren't you happy that millions of Viet Nam citizens live under a system of highly centralized power and big money in the hands of very few? Aren't you delighted that millions of children, women and elders were forced out of their homes on one hour's notice to live off tree roots and nuts of the country? Aren't you grinning that over 60,000 American men were butchered and not allowed to fight to win? Others were crippled for life. Why do thousands of 'slaves' swim past sharks or walk to freedom yearly, if communist rule is so wonderful? What a disgrace to Canadians that our pro-reds (Trudeau, Stanfield and NDP) failed to send our support to help the fight for freedom of the Vietnamese. Have these persons-anti-Canadians not helped some billionaires and the Reds to consolidate their control of all of Vietnam's geography (and rich tin, rubber, etc. resources) for the greater exploitation by these Reds and their billionaire buddies? Ask Conspiracy or National Suicide: don't be surprised if such truths are news to you and me, eg. six column inches of our daily announced criticism by Reds at Queen's by non-criticism of Reds or the contents of the speech!

To the 15 pinko-troublemakers, will you accept one dollar each as a down-payment on one way tickets to Slave China or Slave USSR provided that you will stay ten years on a non-elist job? Surely Rockefeller's friendly to Reds like Cyrus Eaton (Steel) in Nova Scotia or banks in Moscow and Peiping to help them finance shipment of US technology to each country. So don't con men with socialist lingo double talk that Reds-Socialists are the party desire of labour!

New Playwrighting course at the Drama Department

"I feel we're creating our own theatre"

by Eric Hughes

What is essential to any drama education programme? Some will say acting is necessary over and above all other dramatic disciplines. And yet, it is difficult to build any sort of stable, independent dramatic community without some basis in dramatic literature.

This fact is frequently cited as one of the most damning features of the Canadian dramatic scene. As yet, no clear-cut body of Canadian plays has appeared to facilitate the growth of a Canadian theatre and nourish those who wish to be part of that growth.

For Maury Breslow, head of the Queen's Drama Department, this is a pressing problem. He was not born in Canada, but has chosen to work here; and so he is able to see the problem from the outside looking in, as well as vice versa. Maybe this is why his solution seems as correct as it does. "There's a lot of talk about supporting Canadian theatre," he says, "but it's from Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver - not from our own midst. I feel we're creating our own theatre."

The "we" to which Breslow is referring is the special Drama 250 course whose title is "Playwriting". Breslow, who has written many plays of his own (including two children's plays which have been produced at Queen's; "Silver Bird and Scarlet Feather" and "When the World was Young") is the instructor of the course; although it seems that the normal student-teacher relationship has been slightly modified to suit the special needs of the class.

Basically, the study is divided between an investigation of the works of well-known playwrights, and the more practical work of writing one's own plays. The former involves looking at plays for positive lessons (such as, say the economy of means Brecht uses in his "Caucasian Chalk Circle") and also for examples of what not to do (some of the "obvious" dialogue in O'Neill's "Long Day's Journey into Night").

As far as writing his own plays is concerned, the student's objective is not merely to write the play but "to go through the whole process of writing, rewriting and working with actors on a script." To this end, when a playwright has finished a piece, he turns it in to Breslow who reads it and meets with the author to talk about the script. It is then presented to the entire class to read and discuss. The playwright then goes back to his script with these comments in mind and makes what revisions he deems necessary. The play is then read again for the class, and if they feel it could benefit from performance, it is performed.

This Sunday, two of the plays are being performed in Room 102 of Theological Hall at 8:00pm. These are two one acts, the first being "November at 28" by Jamie Agar, and the second the "Second Foul Movement" (From "Three Foul Movements" - the plays centre around outhouses), written by Janet Hinton. As well as being student written, the plays will be performed and directed by students. At the end of the presentations, comments will be invited from the audience. These comments will greatly aid the learning playwrights and make the exercise complete.

Events of this nature will be continuing into April as more plays are completed and produced. As a matter of fact, there is hope for a continuation of the course into a third year level next year depending on administration approval. A close feeling has grown up among the students, and they feel that it would be too bad to have things come to an academic dead end this year, just when they are getting their feet wet. I can't help but agree that Drama 350 could produce some exciting and valuable full length plays, and who knows? We may have a James Reaney here in our midst.

Bitter Grounds Record Review

Askstens Album A.O.K.

by Paul Reynolds

Traditional folk and country blues artists rarely find throngs of record buyers rushing out to hear their latest album of bluegrass banjo picking or the like.

With this in mind, Tom Askstens' album "Original and Traditional Music" is a pleasant surprise. His label, Takoma Records, has cut no corners for this set, providing an excellent studio (Todd Rundgren's Bearsville outfit), and an impressive array of New York folk sessioners to back him up, led by veteran guitarist producer Artie Traum. The result is a relaxed album of first-rate picking with a perfect folk sound, full and clear, yet maintaining a 'live' feel.

Askstens is a New Englander with a strong following among folk fans of that region. To draw comparisons, his mellow, half-spoken vocal style and choice of material are similar to those of other New England-bred folkies, particularly Tom Rush. Like Rush's first effort, this album is mostly traditional blues and jugband tunes with occasional originals thrown in for variety. This purist approach is obvious in his choice of blues like "Ain't Nobody's Business", a highlight of the album with Dick Ecklund's fine cornet breaks driving it along. Askstens' vocals and agile guitar picking are prominent throughout, although he gives ample room to other soloists like Jay Ungar on fiddle and Dick Fegy on mandolin. Fegy's playing is a continual delight, whether picking a solo or adding texture to the haunting, melodic "River Song".

Even on the original tracks, a good-time no-nonsense approach is maintained; no tortured singer-songwriter angst here. As well as the straightforward "River Song", "Stoney Creek, Montana", the bluesy tale of an old mining town could almost be traditional. The Askstens' songs are all rounded off with a couple of banjo solos. This man is immersed in the 'roots' and if you like your folk pure and unadulterated, catch him this weekend at Bitter Grounds. That's tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m.

Latin Music at Queens

The Queen's Spanish Club is proud to introduce a Spanish cultural experience to Kingston-Jesus and Clelia Benites, who will appear on Saturday, March 12 at Grant Hall, at 8:30 p.m. Jesus will perform solo Peruvian classical guitar compositions and will be joined by his wife in the second half of the programme. She is a soprano and will sing some of her renditions of classical Mexican songs.

Jesus Benites studied in Lima and Trujillo, Peru, and at the National Conservatory of Music of Mexico. In 1961 he was awarded a scholarship by world renowned Andres Segovia, with whom he studied at the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Sienna, Italy.

He has played many world premieres and compositions written especially for him. In San Salvador 1973 he gave a complete recital in memory of the Paraguayan guitarist and composer, Augustin Barrios Mangore. According to Japanese critics, Jesus Benites is the sole promoter and leading interpreter of Mangore, and he will be performing several of Mangore's compositions on Saturday evening.

February 1974 marked an innovation in guitar recitals with the presentation of Fonovision - "visual music" - by Mrs. Benites at the Palacio de Bellas Artes in Mexico City. Presently Jesus Benites lectures at the University of Oaxaca, Mexico, teaches, and is an author of classical guitar technique books. He also functions as Vice-President of the

"Sociedad Internacional de Guitarra,
A.C." sponsored by the National Institute of Fine Arts of Mexico

Later she entered the Opera of the Palace of Fine Arts. She is a leader in the promotion of Latin-American music and her repertoire includes songs in several Indo-American languages, two of which - "Nahuatl" and "Quechua" - she will perform on March 12

Tickets for their concert can be attained at the Performing Arts
Office, Tremblay's Music Store,
Sharp and Flat, and Vern Napier's.

Any serious classical guitarists are welcome to attend a Master class to be given by Benites at Tremblay's
Music School, Saturday afternoon (March 12). Arrangements must be made in advance with Tremblay's

Andrina McCulloch Awards . . .

for public speaking

by Andrew Douglas

Since 1941, Andrina McCulloch awards have been given annually to students excelling in public speaking.
Over the years, this has included such varied categories as graduate expositions, radio broadcasting, acting, debating in the faculty of Law's most court programme, and even participating in the "glee club"

This year, a tripartite competition is to be held in three of the more traditional areas - public speaking, poetry reading, and debating. The topics for the first two categories are left to the contestant's discretion;
while the first round of the debating tournament will consider the resolution that "Canada Should Never Let Quebec Separate". Any student is allowed to enter, thereby becoming eligible for one of the $200 first prizes and $100 second prizes.

Until last year, the winners were selected on the basis of work done over the year with various groups on campus - e.g. CFRC, the drama department, the law faculty, etc. But for the second year running, the Andrina McCulloch Senate Subcommittee has decided to run these open competitions in the hope of encouraging wider student participation

Hopefully, there will be an increased number of applicants this year. It is, after all, the only university-wide competition in any of these three areas, and offers an excellent opportunity to those whose gifts in oration would otherwise go unappreciated and unrewarded.
While some preparation is obviously essential, the organizers trust that 3-5 minutes of poetry reading, 5-10 minutes of public speaking or a 15 minute debate will be short enough to overcome the "too much work" or no "time for this" syndrome - and long enough to let talent shine through.

More information is available at the Performing Arts Box Office in the Student Union Building. The number of rounds in any one area and exact times of the various events will not be known until all entries have been submitted to the above office, (deadline is 12 noon on Thursday, March 10th). The finals are scheduled for Friday, March 18th in Dupuis Hall, and it is expected the preliminary heats will be held that afternoon and probably also on the Thursday afternoon and evening

"Bruce Cockburn is in a league by himself"

by Sandy Graham

To criticize is to compare. Critics, being for the most part a stuffy, unimaginative lot, are easily frustrated when deprived of the opportunity to practice this one craft at which they are said to excel. If an artist can continually pursue new and imaginative directions, he will always outdistance his confused detractors. Unfortunately, a great many of them suffer needlessly at the hands of enraged reviewers bewailing the loss of convention and repetition. Bruce Cockburn, however, has never alienated either the press or his audiences. Perhaps the most instantly likeable musician one could hear, his songwriting is so different from anyone else's that it defies attempts at classification. One feels like a criminal if he tries to criticize. Thus, in his laid-back way, Cockburn collects admirers everywhere, aweing them with his remarkable skill and originality. It's frankly impossible to be contemptuous of him. A rather blatant admission from a reviewer no doubt, but he remains one of the few artists who can take my colleagues and myself away from our miserable existence. The difficulty lies in remaining objective about others' music, which can only be accomplished by recognizing that Cockburn is in a league by himself and that he has no peers.

An Ottawa native, Cockburn was born in 1945. He quickly transformed a fairly ordinary musical beginning (boy gets first guitar in high school etc., etc.) into something promising with two years study at the Burklee School of Music in Boston, along with a few youthful months in Europe as a street musician. Satisfied that he had seen at least a bit of the world, he returned to the capital and worked his way through a number of local bands, reaching a peak of sorts with Children in the late sixties. All the while, his dedication to the music itself rather than the life usually associated with it was impressive and remains so today. Finally in 1970 his solo career was born with the release of his first album on the True North label, indeed, True North's first pressing), imaginatively entitled "Bruce Cockburn". Today he has seven albums to his credit, including his latest "In The Falling Dark". Certainly not the stuff of pop legends...but then Cockburn is emphatic in his disdain for commercialism of any sort.

Cockburn's biggest asset is his supremely quiet and peaceful tone. It is such a joy to find music which is not formulated for AM radio, music which is not sensational.

Bruce Cockburn is, in all respects, a perfectionist, a fact which is clearly reflected in each of his records. The professional but warm polish found on every composition provides the crowning touch the right degree of craftsmanship which separates this tunesmith from so many others. The extra studio time he must spend reviewing and revising his work is well worth it. A good melody, abounding with musical hooks, will with some others often fail to gain the effect it should because of flaws in the management or recording. Cockburn sees to it that he avoids both of these problems, without creating a contrived or pretentious sound.

All the attention to detail complements what is a marvellously original pen in the first place. Cockburn's songs exude a happy sense of well-being, characterized by smooth, effortless melodies. Once begun, they seem capable of perpetual motion. Still, he always finds intriguing ways of bringing them to their logical conclusions.

Movement is a recurring theme in the music, and is best exemplified in such selections as "Goin' to the Country" or the movie soundtrack to "Goin' down the Road." Occasionally, though, he will separate tone and rhythm with surprising results; strong solitary chords echo through "A life story" then are transferred into a tight rhythmic and powerful rock. The juxtaposition of genres is fascinating, and Cockburn's maturity ensures that it is well done.

As an acoustic guitarist, I think he is unequalled in Canada, "Skylarking" is a good example of his inspired ad lib playing.

Lyrics are spare, but powerful, influenced by religion, romanticism and his dry, subtle humour. Although I can't say I share his deep religious convictions, his words inspire respect and understanding in me. Cockburn reaches a lot of people by simply stating his own views with no words of explanation. He isn't out to convert, evangelize or even sell himself.

Cockburn is to be enjoyed, not packaged. Maybe I'll risk enraging my editor and not hand in a review. Cockburn's worth it. Anyone want a reviewer's job, real cheap?

Queen's Gals capture OWIAA title

Gals shut off Mac attack

Janean Gerow

by Mini Mac
Once again, the Queen's hockey Gals have returned the OWIAA hockey trophy to its niche at Queen's. The championship games took place in Toronto's Varsity Arena on February 18th and 19th, and although highly expected to lose their final match against McMaster (if indeed, they made it that far) Queen's turned all the tables and emerged with a 3-0 victory over the McMaster, the defending champions.

The weekend all began on Thursday night when, after a short and easy practice, the Gals headed for Toronto and the championship tournament. They had finished their regular season two weeks previously with two victories over York and Toronto respectfully. This left them with a second spot position in the final standings, led only by McMaster. Of the ten season games played (each team was played twice), Queen's had only lost two games - both to Mac. One of the matches against Western had been won by default due to a snowstorm and shortly after this Queen's was informed that Mac had suffered their only loss of the season at the hands of Western. Seeing as Western was the first team that Queen's would meet on the tournament everyone was a little apprehensive especially since Western had finished in a strong 3rd place.

On Friday came the encounter with Western. In order to reach the finals Queen's had to emerge victorious from this match. The team was psyched up and ready to go. Center Janean Gerow wasted no time in demonstrating the urge to win by popping the first goal just 16 seconds into the game. Sandy Statten followed suit with a blast past the unsuspecting Western goalie. By now Queen's was really rolling and there was no stopping them. Janean Gerow scored twice more while Sue Thompson wove her way through the Western defence for her own hat trick. "Pepsi" Symes wound up Queen's scoring thereby lifting them to an easy 8-2 victory.

Now the tough part lay ahead. McMaster had ousted Guelph 5-0 and although they did not play superbly, there was no doubt in the minds of the Queen's players that the final game against Mac would be a true test of their ability. McMaster, on the other hand, seemed quite self-assured. They demonstrated their over-confidence at a banquet that evening where, in so many words, they pronounced themselves "already victorious" champs. The Gals at this point expressed their gratitude for already having had a chance to have finished their meals.

The day of Queen's "Mac Attack" dawned clear and cool with the Gals armed with Mac attack T-shirts and other weapons of hockey warfare (eh, Jane and Woody). Once established at Varsity Arena, the tension was so thick and heavy that you could cut it with a skate.

The final game began with both teams playing their hardest. The first two periods although scoreless, were action packed and full of excitement. Goalie Wanda Gyde came through with some excellent saves, however, there were also close calls on the other side. Queen's had managed to keep Mac off the scoreboard and this was enough to give them strength for the third period.

Kathy (Woody) Wood dealt the first blow shortly into the third period on a pass from Cathy Ebert and Sandy Statten. Mac was now playing defensive hockey, but all their confidence was lost when Sandy Statten displayed her power-packed shot to score the go-ahead goal. Queen's was now in control of the game despite league-leading scorer Lois Cole's attempt to slip past the Queen's defense. "Pepsi" Symes had Queen's dancing when she scored their final goal on a power play.

Although the time seemed to take forever to run out, the buzzer finally went and Queen's players swarmed onto the ice to mob their goalie. After a quick Oil Thigh and the presentation of gold (but what else?) medals, Captain Carol Petty accepted the trophy on behalf of the Gals. After showing the team this beautiful (?) object, players retired to the dressing room which soon became the centre of great havoc and noise-making (as well as like "we did it - we really did it!!")

This game was the last one for the coach Annabella Twiddy as well as for Wanda Gyde (who has three Ontario championships to her credit), Carol Petty, Debbie Adams, Kathy Wood and Sandy Statten. Needless to say, everyone was happy for the season to have ended this way and we wish those who are leaving us the best of luck in the future. Other team members ("Pepsi" Symes, Krash Orlando - imported from Guelph, Sue Thompson, Marg Bartlett, Betty Ried, Jane Shorten, Cathy Eberts, Janean Gerow, Sue Creighton and Paula Cervinka) hope to see another good season next year. For now it's time to be jubilant at the Tap Room. A toast to the Champs!

Rugby Club running to Bermuda

by Ruds

You heard it here first, folks! That's right, the Queen's Rugby Club will attempt to run to Bermuda this Saturday morning.

Starting from Tindall Field and finishing up at the Jock Hartly arena some days later, 2 dozen intrepid boys from Queen's own Rugby Club will participate in a cross-country run-a-thon to help raise funds for an upcoming tour of Bermuda.

Three of that island's Rugby Clubs have extended an invitation to the Golden Gaels to play in a tournament this spring. Only time, and a little support will tell whether our boys can afford to represent us in Bermuda this May. Between now and Saturday a friend may approach you and ask you to pledge him so many cents a mile. What's a few dimes compared to the pleasure of watching, someone sputter and die in 2 feet of Kingston's white stuff.

If dashing through the snow seems like an unorthodox way of calling attention to yourself it's not because the rugby club hasn't tried the more conventional methods. The club is currently holding for a Wintario grant and are undertaking a variety of fund raising schemes, this Sunday's showing of Doctor Zhivago included.

An intercollegiate athlete may ask you to help him go on tour this spring. Without a little help they may well have to run on water.

OAAA Swimming Championships

Record finish

The OAAA Swimming Championships were held on February 18th and 19th at University of Toronto just edged out Waterloo on the last race to gain their 17th consecutive championship. It was an exciting meet with eight new OAAA records and one new Ontario mark being established.

The Queen's team came up with the strongest performance in the history of swimming at the school, accumulating more points than any past Queen's team. In addition, four new Queen's records were established, two by Greg Vanular (100 and 200 backstroke) and one each by Tim Dennis (200 IM) and Ken Davies (50 freestyle). There were also several other excellent races swam by the other members of the team, particularly in the final race where Brian Dalziel, Roger Cassidy, Marty Demmers and Scott Scheuermann all swam personal best times to win the consolation final of the 800 freestyle relay.

Team co-captain Tim Dennis placed a close second in the 200 IM, while establishing a new school record, came third in the 100 breast stroke and was fifth in the 100 butterfly consolation final. Vanular was fourth in both backstroke events and also came sixth in the 100 butterfly which is an admirable performance considering the amount of training put in by Greg. (Yes, girls, everything you've heard about him is true!) Drew 'Florida' Fagan was third in the consolation final of the 200 IM and Ken Davies started off well by setting a new record in the heats of the 50 freestyle but unfortunately fell sick and although he swam the rest of his races, he was not nearly up to his full potential.

These four combined to finish sixth in the 400 yard medley relay in a good time and Fagan and Davies joined with co-captain Dalziel and Lang Britchford to put together a near record time on the way to sixth in the 400 freestyle relay. Queen's 'B' team made up of Alex Muir, Jim Baker, Jim Wiley and Roger Cassidy also swam their way into the finals of the same race. Muir and Schnitter qualified for the finals of the 200 I.M., while team newcomer Gerry Bally swam three personal best times in his events. Scott Scheuermann placed 11th in the gruelling mile swim and Cassidy and Dalziel just failed to qualify for the 500 yard freestyle.

At the other end of the pool, diving coach 'Baby Face' Nelson Friedman guided his two rookie divers somewhat precariously to excellent results on both one and three metre boards. On the one metre springboard both George Southey and Grog Anderson narrowly missed qualifying for the finals. But on the higher board the two both qualified

Weedend meet in Toronto

Our Gaels at York track event

Early Saturday morning, a few members of the track team made the trek down to Toronto for the York University All Comer's Track Meet. The day started off with Jim Morrison placing 3rd in the men's 50 metre hurdles and then Jean Dietrich also placed third in the women's 50 metre hurdles. Jean then went on to place first in the high jump.

Next on the track, Kathy Cook had a 2nd place finish in the 300 metres in a personal best time of 43.4 secs, and Charlie Hitchson ran a good 400 metres to come first with a time of 51.0 secs. Meanwhile back in the high jump area, Mike Forsayeth equalled the Queen's Record of 1.95 metres and assures us all that he will reach 2 metres this Saturday.

Back on the track Sue Plummer had a P.B. in the 1000 metres with a time of 3:22.4 and Cella Russel also had a personal best run. In the men's 1000 metres, Dale Friesen came 4th in 2:34.5.

The 5000 metres proved to be exciting with Mike DeGuda running an excellent race in a time of 14:55.2 - a personal best by 16 seconds. Max Barr and Les McGregor also had a good 5000 race and these two just came back from a marathon in Washington DC. Max finished the more than 26 miles in 2 hours 38 minutes 12 secs to place 10th out of over 500 competitors and Les placed 83rd with a time of 3 hours 23 secs, an excellent time for his first marathon.

Everyone is looking forward to this coming weekend as the Gaels and Gals head to Toronto for the University Indoor Championships.

Curlers impressive at McGill

Five Queen's curling club teams journeyed to Montreal during Reading Week to play in the McGill Invitational Mixed Curling Bonspiel. Together, Ken Kozlik, Tom Turnbull, Steve Ricketts, Gilbert Dawson and Ole Kihle compiled an impressive 11-4 won-lost record, with the only losses coming when they were forced to play each other. Gilbert Dawson drew the bye into the final and emerged the champion, defeating Tom Turnbull 6-3. Curling with Gilbert were Kathy Stewart, Cliff Snelling, and Karen Wylie. In the consolation final, Steve Ricketts, who lost 6-5 to Tom on last rock in the semi-finals, rebounded to crush MacDonald College of McGill 11-1.

Ski team triumphs

The men's ski team won the Ontario Universities Alpine Championship at Georgian Peaks on February 17 and 18. The last two races of the series consisted of a slalom and a giant slalom hosted by the University of Waterloo. Both races proved to be real cliffhangers with the Gaels winning the slalom by the narrow margin of two points over the University of Toronto and Toronto reversing proceedings next day by taking the giant slalom - this time by a two point margin over Queen's.

The final tally of each school's best four results from six races showed Queen's in front with 39 points out of a possible 40, Toronto second with 38 points, Western Ontario third with 35; and York, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Waterloo, McMaster, Guelph, Trent, Brock, and R.M.C. trailing. The first compilation of the series points total indicated a tie between Queen's and Toronto with Queen's declared the winner on the basis of individual total points. However, an error in transferring figures from the official record was detected and showed the Gaels winners of the final slalom and so the clear winners overall.

Brian Fitzpatrick was the top Gael in the meet with a 2nd place finish in the slalom and an 8th place in the giant slalom. Rob Gripper was 12th in the slalom, Bill Hartman 14th, and Tim Wardrop 19th. Reid Drury had binding problems just before the start of the slalom and skied under handicap. Queen's only had five men in this race thanks to mid-terms but still managed to come out on top.

In the giant slalom, in addition to Brian's 8th place, Tim Wardrop finished 10th, Ian Neilson 11th, Rob Gripper 16th, and Bill Hartman racing in the sixth and last seed came 26th. There were 72 racers in all.

Curiously, no one on the team won a race individually this season. The best single finishes were a 2nd, a 3rd, and a 5th. However, the overall depth combined with great individual ability paid off in the team results, and that is where it counts.

The women's team didn't fare as well in the Waterloo Invitational but the girls came 3rd in the giant slalom with Waterloo and Western ahead of them. Jane McGillvary had a 3rd place finish, Robin McLeod 7th, Jill Fuller and Janice Rahn 12th and 13th and Stephanie Currie 17th. Actually, this was one of the best team results for the girls of the season. In the slalom, Jane had another 3rd, Jill Fuller was 12th, Robin McLeod 17th, Stephanie Currie 19th, and Janice Rahn 22nd. The team came out 4th overall with Western Ontario winning the event.

Over the season, Western finished on top with 38 total points, Toronto and Waterloo tied for 2nd with 37 points each, and dropping Guelph to 4th with 32 points, and Queen's in 5th place with 29 points and ahead of Trent and McMaster.

Athletes honoured

by Tom Shand

On March 17th the athletes of Queen's from the 1976-1977 school year will be honoured in an event held annually entitled Colour Night. It was announced recently by Al Lenard, director of Men's intercollegiate Athletics, that there will be a major change in the format for this prestigious affair. Increased expenses and an increased propensity for food fights, a la Leonard Hall Cafeteria on a Saturday night, has forced those responsible for organizing the evening to reevaluate the need for a banquet. This year would have been the first in which the athletes would have been required to pay for their meal.

The banquet has been replaced by a disco dance for the athletes, coaches, etc and their dates. The tentative schedule for events is as follows: an Awards ceremony in Bartlett Gym at 7:00 P.M. followed by an OIL Thigh and a piper led march down to the Jock Hartly Arena for the dance.

It is hoped that this new experimental approach will not only serve to reduce costs thereby allowing the allocation of more funds for other athletic endeavours but will cause more of the festive times associated with Colour Night to be celebrated as a group at the event rather than having the before and after drunks and parties steal the entire show.

Bews News

The Playoffs

by Mike Gouinlock

The crunch is on! This week and next are the last two weeks in the Bews program and playoffs are beginning in the majority of this term's sports.

Two weeks ago the Bews Swim Meet was held amidst mid-terms and hockey quarter-finals. It was probably the most exciting intramural meet held here in recent years. John Woollatt sends this report "The lead changed hands only once, but for PHE, once was not enough. With the 200 yard Free Style Relay the last event to swim, only seven points separated Commerce 80 (63), Arts 77 (65) and PHE (70). A win or a second place finish by the always strong PHE team would clinch them first place. Only a win and a dismal race by PHE would allow either Arts 77 or Commerce 80 to win the championship. Arts 77 went out fast and never relinquished their lead. The team of Bruce Evernden, Don McLean, John Woollatt and Chris Johnston tied the Bews record of 1:44.5 they had set the night before in winning the race. Commerce 80 was a fingernail behind in 1:44.9 with MBA hot on their suits. As a result of the race, Arts 77 won the meet with Commerce 80 second and PHE third. Over 300 different swimmers participated over the three nights. Comm 78 led the way with 66 swimmers followed by MBA and Civil-Math with 57 each. Although Arts 77 won the team honours, it was MBA who were the overall Bews points winners with 2070 points.

Quarter-final hockey action prior to reading week produced a couple of mild upsets. Favored Meds ousted Mechanical 4-2 despite missing four key players to injuries. Arts 78 had a little more trouble with PHE than expected but managed to come away with a 2-1 victory. An Arts 77 comeback was halted by two stupid penalties and some sharp goaltending by Mining's Ian Berzins. Tight checking, a lot of desire and the most important ingredient for a winning team, a little bit of luck gave Mining a 3-2 victory over the defending champions. In the other quarter-final Commerce 78 opened an early 3-0 lead before favoured Commerce 79 stormed back in the last period to tie the game. The score could easily have been 6-3 had it not been for 78 goalie Frank McAuley. Penalty shot overtime was the result and it was extremely exciting. Steve Flesch caught McAuley unaware as he blasted a low slap shot into the corner. Dave Bounsall tied the best of three competition at 1-1 as he snapped a shot over 79 goalie Tim Price's glove hand. The goaltenders traded saves leaving Geoff Arnoldie as the final 79 shooter. He made the mistake of coming in too fast and McAuley outmanoeuvred him on the deke. This put a lot of pressure on Price to stop Jim Hurlbut, however one good move and a backhand later, and Commerce 78 had a 4-3 victory, a nice way to win...a tough way to lose.

The first two semi-final games were played on Monday and Tuesday night. The semi-final games are stop time and a two-game total goal series. Arts 78 takes a 5-4 lead into its second game with Comm 78 on the basis of Scott Campbell's late goal, and Meds has a commanding 9-4 lead over Mining.

ADMINISTRATIVE NOTES...Sue Bolton is accepting applications in the Rec. Office for convenors for next year in the following sports, badminton, ball hockey, basketball, bowling, broomball, curling, flag football, free throw, golf, handball, harrier, hockey, horseshoes, in-nertube waterpolo, monsterball, paddleball, rugby, soccer, softball, skiing, squash, swimming, table tennis, tennis, track and field and relays, tug-o-war, volleyball and waterpolo. One cannot under estimate the importance of student convenors. Without them the system cannot function. The job requires good organization, some phoning and minimal work if you're organized. There are honorariums for each sport, and there are a lot of positions open because the majority of convening this past year has been done by Arts 77 and graduating PHE students.....M.I.M.A.C. meeting at 7:00 p.m. on March 9th in Seminar A of the Phys. Ed. Centre....

All people still left in the Bews Squash and Table Tennis draws, please check the deadlines, they have been changed. All games must be completed by Thursday, March 10th at the latest. Bews Awards Night is scheduled for Tuesday, March 15th at 5:30 p.m. in the Underground. Tickets are one dollar and are available from your athletic stick

Gals V-ball ranks 4th

by Jill Calder

The coach is pleased. The girls are pleased. This year's young team ranked fourth in the province against much older, much more experienced teams. The finals at Waterloo the weekend prior to reading week was the toughest set of three matches the girls were subjected to all season long. The top two teams: Waterloo and Western, fought it out with Western coming out on top for one more year. (They lost to UBC in the nationals. This is the first time they have been defeated at that level since their incarnation six years ago.)

The Gals seemed to have third place all wrapped up earlier in the season but ran into difficulties with a lot of casualties. Jill Calder was the first to fall and break her ankle, but was quickly followed up by Nicola Randall one week later who suffered damage to ligaments of her ankle. Another week passed and Debbie Lidstone went over on hers, but managed to come back for the remainder of the season. Even the assistant coach, Jane Pettersen suffered a badly sprained ankle while filling up a position for a drill. Laura Yanz, with just two practices to go, did the same thing.

So the healthiest team in the league we were not, but the decline in numbers did not deter the rest of the girls. Cathy Sproul, setter and team captain put in a marvelous season providing unity on the court and acting as ambassador of Queen's to the coaches, players, and referees.

Aside from these "invalids" and older members of the team, the rest of the team who each gave 110 percent of their time and effort were: Diane Brown, Janice Heard, Jan Lavender, Jane Reble, and Jane Skirda. Special thanks go to Corrine MacAuley who came out late in the season to refurbish the ranks due to injuries.

Thanks also to Jane Pettersen, assistant coach, and Marilyn Robson, playing manager, and of course, Donna Gallagher, coach.

Grapplers 6th for 3rd year

by Alex Faseruk

On Saturday Feb. 19 and Sunday Feb. 20, the Golden Grapplers competed in the OUA Championships. For the third year in a row the Gals walked away with undisputed position of sixth place by compiling 21 points.

This year Queen's sent its strongest contingent in recent memory to the championships but received tough draws in the opening rounds of competition. They were therefore only able to manage a sixth place finish by mustering 4 fourth place finishes as well as a fifth and two sixths. The OUA crown was won by Guelph as they edged out Western, the pre-tournament favourites.

Mike Moggridge who finished in fourth spot at 134 lbs. was just barely edged out of third place in an extremely exciting contest. Mike gave Mike Barry, the Canadian champion from Western, a strong fight as he lost by a 19-11 margin.

The heavier weights provided the rest of the fourth place finishers for Queen's. At 190 lbs. Tom Rhind finished fourth. At 220 lbs. Jim Muller had an extremely tough draw in the earlier rounds by meeting the eventual winner and second place finisher. As such he was not able to gain higher than fourth. At heavyweights, Murray Buchanan provided Queen's last fourth.

John Voys placed fifth at 150 lbs. while Larry Pearson and Tom Humphrey finished sixth at 126 and 177 lbs. respectively.

The championships concluded the varsity season for the Golden Gals, although some of the members of the team will compete in the Ontario and

Yankee batboys get the shaft

by Michael Fitzgibbon

Money, get away
Get a good job with more pay and you're okay
Money it's a gas
Grab that cash with both hands and make a stash

-Pink Floyd

The New York Yankees have added yet another page to the much-publicized journal on today's overpaid and selfish athlete. It was revealed last week that the Yankees snubbed their batboys in traditional World Series bonuses. The Cincinnati Reds, on the other hand, handed out an astonishing $6,591 to each of their home batboys. The difference lies in the fact that the Reds appreciate the importance and helpfulness of the batboy while the Yankees obviously take his services for granted.

George Steinbrenner's boys voted 15-10 against sharing a portion of their paychecks. You can bet your bippy that some of the Yankees affluent players loudly voiced their disapproval of this traditional bonus. These fatcats are getting top bucks but somehow can't afford to donate a meager $20. They are out to grab all the cash they can lay their mitts on. These overpaid snobs will probably start charging awe-struck kids 25c for their scrawl. They are the same ones who would start a cancer research fund in their name and foot the American Cancer Society with the bill.

Maybe the New York Yankees believe that the $12 a game which their "assistants" earn is more than sufficient. In reality the wages are peanuts. The batboy toils a couple of hours each game, but his hours off the field account for the major segment of his day. At the very least he works five hours each day that the team is home. This works out to $2.40 an hour - 10c over the minimum New York State wage. Considering that the Yanks are home for only 80 games during the season makes the batboy's financial situation at the summer's end not all that great.

The batboy is a virtually unnoticed part of the game of baseball. His job involves an array of various duties ranging from cleaning the players uniforms to chasing foul balls during the game. His job is by no means easy. It requires long, hard hours and immeasurable dedication.

Perhaps the Yankees think that the prestige and honor which surround the batboy account for the true value of the job. After all, the batboy is closely associated with the big-name players and very few boys can claim to be so fortunate. The job is indeed envied by millions of teenage boys across America, but if the Yanks think that their mere presence makes up for their snobbery - they are dead wrong. If anything, their cheapskate attitude devalues the honor of the job.

The New York Yankees are guilty of first degree selfishness. Their love of money and fame overshadows their playing capabilities. I vote that the players be made to chase their own foul balls, shine their own shoes, and gather their own equipment this season. At the end of the year they are bound to appreciate the true value of the batboy and won't be so apt to take him for granted in 1978.

Fencing ends

by Vivian Ropchan

This weekend at University of Toronto the Ontario Women's fencing finals were held. The Queen's team composed of Rosemary Knight, Mary Jane Henderson, Mariam Niamu, Sharon Mitchum and Mary-Jane Baldwin competed in the team finals on Saturday. Despite an excellent season the girls did not place. On Sunday the individual finals were held with Rosemary Knight, Mary Jane Henderson and Mariam Niamu competing for Queen's. The girls had improved greatly from the day before - Rosemary, Mary Jane and Mariam all did excellently in the quarter finals and advanced to the semi-finals, with Rosemary moving on to the Ontario finals where she placed fourth.

Special thanks go to coach Deb Christian who was always around to give the girls advice and cheer them on.

Amin backs out

Ugandan President, Idi Amin, yesterday cancelled his orders for a meeting of about 240 Americans in Uganda, and lifted his ban on them leaving the country. President Amin called for the meeting after American President Jimmy Carter criticized internal "policies" in Uganda.

The meeting was first set for February the 28th, and was then postponed to Wednesday, March 2nd when some Americans indicated that they could not make it in time. Radio Uganda warned that the United States should not mount a raid similar to the one carried out by the

Trudeau speaks in Washington

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's speech to the American Congress on Tuesday February 22 was well received. He won the most applause when he assured the joint session that Canada will remain united, and achieved a standing ovation at the end of his 20 minute speech.

The major points of his speech dealt with Canada's dedication to multiculturalism, the possible separation of Quebec, and the desirability of a robust partnership with the United States.

The speech was well received by most U.S. congressmen. Congressman O'Neill, who earlier criticized speeches to Congress by foreign leaders said his comments were not meant to apply to such good neighbours as Mr. Trudeau. Clement Zablocki, chairman of the House Committee on International Relations said Mr. Trudeau's speech "can't help improving relations with Canada". Most senators and congressmen interviewed thought it was the most candid speech they had heard given by a foreign leader.

Progressive Conservative Leader Joe Clark described the speech as one that reflected what most Canadians would have wanted their national leader to tell the U.S. Congress. New Democratic Party Leader Ed Broadbent said Mr. Trudeau's speech was "an elegant and sensitive description of Canada's problems". Quebec Premier Rene Levesque noted that Trudeau "seemed to have problems with reading the script."

Israelis. Radio Uganda, in an attempt to calm U.S. alarm, also stated that President Amin wanted to thank the missionaries for their work and planned to award special medals to some of the Americans.

Genetic advance

A group of British scientists, headed by Dr. F. Sanger of the Laboratory of Molecular Biology in Cambridge, England, has determined the complete genetic structure of a living organism - the first time this has ever been done. The British scientists, analyzing the DNA of the virus Phi X174, have determined the sequence of the 5,375 nucleotides that make up the entire genetic information contained in this organism.

The research is regarded as a milestone in genetic research. "For the first time it is possible to look at a viral genome as a giant molecule of known structure, all functions of

Russian expelled

At the end of last week a Russian scientist was accused of trying to buy classified documents and was ordered out of the country. Lev Khvostantsev, one of 23 Russian scientists currently visiting Canada as part of a Soviet-Canadian exchange program, was working at the National Research Council in Ottawa. He became friends with a fellow scientist, who informed the RCMP when Khvostantsev began offering money for classified documents.

Khvostantsev's attempt would have been in vain even if his fellow worker had been more cooperative - two years ago NRC decided on a policy of not handling any sensitive top-secret work.

Train wrecks

A week ago Thursday fourteen cars of a sixty-car CN freight train derailed west of Brockville. About one thousand feet of track was ripped up during the incident, which was probably caused by a broken axle on the third engine. None of the four-man crew were injured.

Then last Saturday another CN freight train derailed, with twenty-seven cars going off the tracks near Napanee. Freight and passenger trains were rerouted around the city, with buses being used to transport passengers between Brockville and Belleville.

A CN train also derailed near Cobourg two weeks ago. One theory is that the severe winter weather may have hurt some of the coupling equipment, and have thus contributed to this rash of accidents.

French in schools

By 1978 other subjects may be taught in French in Frontenac County elementary schools. Next fall twenty minutes of French instruction daily will begin for pupils in Grades 1 to 4 in all schools under the Frontenac

County board of education jurisdiction.

The upgrading and expansion of French programs in area schools is expected to continue in the near future, and trustees feel this represents important progress in our educational system.

Doomed hotel

City Council will not allow a Toronto developer to add an extra story to his proposed $12 million hotel at Brock and Ontario streets. The developer has stated that the project will not be economically sound if the size of the hotel is limited in such a way. Aldermen are adamant that the "streetscape" and skyline of the downtown area must be preserved.

Grand reopens

The old Grand hotel on Princess street has opened its doors under a new name and a different owner. It is now the King's Hotel, owned by Ron Mitchell and under the management of his son, Richard.

One of the highlights of the newly-renovated hotel is a modern-style discotheque which will serve lunch at noon and cater to anyone at night, as long as they do not wear blue jeans.

Odds and ends

A new trend in clothing is coming - snap socks that fasten together with tiny plastic snaps and stay locked in pairs during laundry, drawer rummaging and sock fights. And 70 percent of the husbands surveyed in the States even said that they would snap their socks together before throwing them on the floor.

An 11-year-old boy of Sturgeon Falls was walking through a dark parking lot one night last week when he heard something flapping behind him. He turned and ten large claws dug into his face. His attacker was a dark-coloured owl who remains at large.

Drink coffee to support Idi Amin! Most of Uganda's income comes from sales of a coarse kind of coffee, $2.3 million of which was imported last year by Canada. Plus a lot of Canada's instant coffee comes from the U.S., which bought $79.9 million of coffee from Uganda in 1976.

Reduced services on the way:

Faculty declines P-E user's fees, $100M deal fails

By Paul Finkel

Principal Watts has announced the possibility of a "reduction of services and economizing" for the Pys. Ed Centre, following the failure of negotiations designed to implement an athletic users fee, passed by referendum last year.

Speaking at the February meeting of Senate, Principal Watts said that the $100,000 expected to be generated from the additional charge will not be realized.

Vice principal T. D. Bonham, elaborating on the principal's statements, stressed that "there should be no suggestion that we are attaching blame to any particular party." He said that the breakdown in the negotiations between the AMS and the other user groups regarding a contribution comparable to that of the students, occurred due to "different points of view" and difficulties in finding a suitable mechanism for implementation.

In a telephone interview with The Journal Mr. Bonham declined to expand on the problems that befell the negotiations claiming that "it was rather difficult to be fair". He also said a "very guarded approach" was being taken towards the situation in an effort not to alarm the student body.

Former AMS president, Paul Steep, explained that the referendum held last year made implementation of the $7.50 universal fee for students conditional on "suitable arrangements" being worked out for other groups which included the Faculty Association.

He felt that it was clear to Mr. Bonham and the AMS that the proposal that came from the Faculty Association was not acceptable, and added that the whole situation had some "interesting side issues".

He said that the Faculty Association claims to rate the Pys Ed

Mr. Steep found it "rather disturbing" that the "lower income groups" such as the students and the Staff Association (which represents the maintenance and other non-academic staff), agreed to pay a universal users fee while the Faculty Association "which receives about 80 percent of the University budget in salaries" did not.

He considered the position of the Faculty Association in the negotiations to be "awfully touchy" and believed that they hadn't lived

Can't dance at disco bar, Gays picket

Sarah Yarnell

Twenty-four gays and supporters picketed the King's disco bar on Princess Street last Saturday to protest the bar's policy of prohibiting males from dancing together.

On March 1, management of the King's asked two men from the Queen's Homophile Association to stop dancing, but allowed women to dance together. QHA spokesman John Phair said. When they called the policy sexist, the 12 gays and friends were told the ban on same sex dancing was extended to include women, Phair said.

Richard Mitchell, 25 year-old manager of the King's, said on Saturday that the policy stands, despite the picketing. "We cater to the majority who would find males dancing together offensive."

The King's is new, has not yet established a clientele, and would gain a reputation as a gay bar if men were allowed to dance together, Mitchell said. "We couldn't keep going as a gay bar, we would sustain severe losses."

Pickers included QHA members and supporters, five representatives from Gays of Ottawa and two from Trent Homophile.

"A lot of people here today are not gay, they are supporters of gays and women," Phair pointed out.

Ross Sutherland, member of the campus Socialist Coalition, was among the supporters carrying

Court decides to re-run elections

Anne Johnson

At an AMS Court Public hearing on Wednesday March 9, the February referendum-elections were ruled invalid. The Court, consisting of Chief Justice Mike Yearly, Assistant Chief Justice Brian Newby, and Justices Mike Minns and Linda Mollenhauer deliberated over the issue that was referred to them: namely the early closing of the Leonard Cafeteria polling station, and came to the unanimous conclusion that the election-referendum must be re-run. This is the first time that a decision of this nature has had to be taken.

According to Chief Justice Yearly, who is also Chief Electoral Officer, "The court has investigated the matter exhaustively, and has explored every avenue it thought might provide some alternative to this conclusion. None could be found."

The Court recommended that the election be re-run as soon as is practicable, and the dates of March 23 and 24 were suggested in this respect. However, an Outer Council motion was passed on Thursday March 10 recommending a two-day rather than a one-day election.

Court decision published, pg. 14

The decision, which does not affect nomination or campaign procedures, nullifies only the net effects of the two February days' voting. Yearly pointed out that "the effect of the Court's decision is to return the campus to the morning of February 9 with respect to the election-referendum." The candidates and referendum propagandists were requested to refrain from campaigning so that no one candidate or cause could gain an unfair advantage before the new election date.

For those candidates who do not wish to go through with the election a second time, Yearly observed that there is always the option of withdrawing or conceding. "It is assumed that successful candidates will take office after March 23 in accordance with the practice of their respective societies," added Yearly.

At this point in time, candidates in both the Commerce and Engineering Societies who were unsuccessful on February 9, 10 have conceded their positions to the "winners". Hence, no election will be held for those two societies. In Arts and Science, neither Gerry Lewarne nor John Ryder-Burbidge will run for a one year position on Outer Council.

The Wednesday hearing was the final of three meetings that the AMS Court held while considering this matter. The facts regarding the early closing of the poll were "clear and uncontested." Explained Yearly, "the matter is governed by the AMS Constitution." The Chief returning

The ASUS Awards—1977

Winners of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society Awards, granted annually to "four members of the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society, who, through example of action in non-athletic activities, have made an outstanding contribution", were announced last week. Those who received the awards are Bob Atkinson, Mike MacMillan, Susan Walsh and Brian Young.

Mike MacMillan has been deeply involved with student activities at Queen's at all levels. He is most noted for his work with the Film Department and the role he played in the production of "The Academic Cloister". MacMillan was on the ASUS Orientation Committee 1977, and was instrumental in re-writing the frosh handbook for Arts and Science.

Susan Walsh has focused her concern primarily with the Geography Department, and has been a DSC for the past four years. She was a member of Faculty Board, and sat on the Academic Orientation Committee in 1974-75 and 1975-76.

Walsh was the driving force behind an orientation publication for extension students.

Brian Young has been on the ASUS Executive, as Treasurer in 1975-76 and as Vice-President in 1976-77, and has earned the respect of all who have worked with him for his energy and effectiveness. He has also worked with CFRC during his four years at Queen's.

Bob Atkinson is well known and respected by faculty and students alike, for the contribution he has made to ASUS, primarily as an AMS Rep. and as President in 1975-76. The dedication shown by him towards Queen's as a whole makes him worthy of an ASUS Award.

"Seduction as opposed to rape?"

Annette Nicholson

As Canada emerged from World War II in close economic ties with the United States, she was faced with three options: autarchy, an alliance with the sterling bloc, or a customs union with the U.S., said Jack Granatstein here last Tuesday night.

Granatstein, professor of history at York University, quoting Hugh Wrong, once Canadian Ambassador in Washington, explained that a customs union would have been in "the political interests of the United States and the economic interests of Canada." According to Granatstein, MacKenzie King killed the proposal out of fear of losing the 1948 election on the issue of commercial union with the U.S.

Granatstein was not convinced by the economists' arguments for a customs union: "Economically they were probably right but politically they were wrong, then and now."

Granatstein pointed out how "extraordinarily accommodating" the Americans were in this period. Canada, to solve her dollar reserves crisis after the war, sought to get allowances for purchases in Canada with Marshall Plan money. By March 1949, 20 percent of the Marshall Plan dollars had been spent in Canada, explained Granatstein.

He attributed the American helpfulness to a recognition that Canada's continued prosperity and political support was important to the U.S.

Therefore, Granatstein concurred "the Americans are seducing us as opposed to raping us."

All is quiet on the 49 th Parallel

by Giles Gheron

Canada's Ambassador to Washington, Mr. Jake Warren, reports that relations between Canada and the United States "are in pretty good shape", a situation which he expects will persist. Although such news might have been greeted more cynically at universities in years past, the audience at Queen's last Wednesday evening seemed relieved to hear it.

Mr. Warren's speech dwelt in large measure upon the high degree of cooperation which can be said to have characterized Canada's relations with her southern neighbour. Yet he attempted to show that such a relationship is gradually achieving a better balance. "Not only are Americans becoming increasingly aware of Canada's position as one of the top six or seven industrialized countries in the world," he said, but due to the high degree of political and cultural interaction between the two countries, they are coming to recognize that "Canadian actions and policy decisions have significant impacts in the United States". Mr. Warren himself has observed that since taking up his current posting in July 1975, "there have been more items on the agenda arising from Canadian policies, actions and initiative than has been the case in reverse".

Thus Mr. Warren laid great emphasis upon the interdependent nature of the relationship between the U.S. and Canada and argued that this interdependence has been based upon mutual respect. For while the sharing of the "North American bed" had led to problems, the solutions to which have not implied confrontation, by the same token "the similarity between the two countries does not imply sameness".

Ambassador Warren illustrated his perception of the uniquely interdependent Canadian-American relationship by referring to perhaps its most obvious and enduring aspect, namely the sharing of an environment. Citing numerous examples, he sought to show how, owing to the geographic proximity of the two countries, the formulation of domestic policy in one country, could impinge upon crucial interests in the other. A prominent case is the Garrison Diversion, a major irrigation project in the American Midwest which could have damaging effects in the forms of contaminated run-off waters in Manitoba.

After much debate, the American government recently accommodated Canadian concern by halting construction on a major part of the $500 million project until a final International Joint Commission report has been reviewed and considered by the American and Canadian governments. Calling this "a good example of project management", Mr. Warren emphasized that the solution of this issue had been expedited through resort to one of the principal institutional arrangements designed to help deal with problems arising along the Canada-U.S. boundary—the International Joint Commission.

It is the use of such special arrangements to facilitate the processes of the interrelationship between the two countries and supplement the traditional concepts of diplomacy which has helped ensure that "Big Donkey (USA) and Giant Beaver will continue to be able to get along in that part of the World Environment called North America".

Richard Lipsey

PC's debate controls

by Gerry Lewame

"The PC party went fundamentally backwards by advocating wage and price controls." The party "ought to be saying to people that there are enormous advantages to having a decentralized market economy," said Prof. Richard C. Lipsey of the Queen's Economics Department.

Lipsey, and Robert Stanfield, former leader of the Opposition, Prof. S.F. Kaliski, also of the Queen's Economics Department, participated in a debate sponsored by the PC campus association last Wednesday evening.

Mr. Stanfield stated that "wage and price controls are quite consistent with Conservative principles when they are used to meet a temporary problem." He maintained that controls can be effective in the short term so that people can have a breathing space. Moreover, he said he prefers the use of controls instead of very tight monetary and fiscal policy because the latter has detrimental effects on the poorer regions of the country such as the Maritimes.

However, he also noted that "controls discourage investment and we don't want that today."

Professor Kaliski argued that the principle dangers of controls are political because of the dangers to human freedom. "Kaliski went on to say 'we shouldn't allow ourselves to be bamboozled by the government' pickets from 2pm until 3pm. "Gays need support. Without some generalized support they aren't going

who have quoted the deceleration of inflation in the past year as proof that controls work. In fact the deceleration was caused by lagging food prices and that "had nothing to do with controls." "Florida fruit prices, rising oil prices, and the depreciated Canadian dollar will all lead to inflation and that will have nothing to do with controls," he said.

Prof. Lipsey asserted that using controls gives rise to "one mess which creates a second mess which creates a third mess" because "there is no such thing as one intervention."

Lipsey also stated "when the right wing party sells its values down the drain (by advocating controls), then we don't have a right wing party" and we need one to balance the political spectrum.

Stanfield replied, "I am surprised to come here and find such a simplistic viewpoint."

to overcome their oppression."

Kathy Howes represented the Queen's Women's Law Caucus at the demonstration. Howes, one of two women dancing together at the King's on March 1, said she was picketing to fight the attitude that women only go to bars to be picked up, and dance together only until men ask them to dance.

The Feminist-Socialist Study Group endorsed the protest, said representative Sophie Bissonnette "Gay rights are important to women's lib," she said.

Placards carried by the picketers included "The King's is sexist," "Anti-gay is sick," and "Discrimination lives here!"

The protest seemed to provide afternoon entertainment for a crowd of over 130 spectators that gathered across the street. There was very little jeering and most observers appeared content to watch.

"I can't believe people would get up on Princess Street and admit they're gay," a 14-year-old girl said.

"They don't have to be ashamed of being gay but they don't have to announce it to everybody either," another young person said.

Many spectators did not understand the protest, perhaps because too few leaflets were handed out among the crowd. "Queen's Homophile Association is holding this picket to protest the bar's sexist and anti-gay policies," the flyer stated.

Bar manager Richard Mitchell and the QHA plan no further action on the issue of same sex dancing at the King's.

QHA misunderstood and misrepresented

When members of the Queen's Homophile Association addressed a health class at Loyalist Collegiate and Vocational Institute recently, a pupil's mother complained, and controversy grew to include the Frontenac Board of Education and the Whig Standard. Controversy is cooling now, but QHA members are frustrated and angry, and say they have been misunderstood and misrepresented.

"We just want a chance to state our case," explained QHA member Lyn Atwood. Parents have charged that QHA was recruiting in the high schools, and QHA wants to deny that, Atwood said.

"Our aim in speaking to high school students is to dispel the myths and misconceptions that have grown up around homosexuality, to allay fears and hostility, and to get rid of the stigma attached to the lifestyle," Atwood said. The fourth-year Queen's Phys Ed student said QHA is drawing on recent research to show that homosexuality is just a part of human sexuality.

QHA members have been spending several days at area high schools to speak to health classes. Response from the pupils is excellent, Atwood said. Most of the students rapidly shed old misconceptions about gays during the educational sessions.

In Atwood's B.P.E. thesis she demonstrates how students in four out of six local high schools are taught that homosexuality is an illness. Teachers are using outdated and poorly done studies as basis for what students are taught about homosexuality, and are ignoring more recent research, Atwood said.

Chevron ed. says staff agitated

OTTAWA (CUP)—Participants in a formal Canadian University Press (CUP) investigation into the legitimacy of the Free Chevron and its responsibility to University of Waterloo students "would get their necks wrung" by the paper's staff, according to its editor, Larry Hannant.

Hannant said he was misquoted in a March 1 CUP story and that his reported remarks "were a complete lie" that had been taken out of context from an informal conversation in which he did not know he was being interviewed.

He was quoted as telling a McGill Daily reporter that, "The students don't want an investigation of any sort. Anyone who tries to come in to investigate will get their faces bashed in."

Instead, Hannant said in a March 2 interview, it is "not students but the staff who is agitated." He added that it was "an investigation into the paper itself that could lead to violence," and reaffirmed the paper's position that an investigation into the student federation's shutdown of the Chevron last September should take place only after the paper is reinstated to its former position.

The Free Chevron editor also clarified his denunciation of the McGill University student newspaper made at a recent conference called by the deposed executive of la Presse Etudiants Nationale (PEN). He said his remarks stemmed from a discussion at the 39th national CUP conference in Vancouver dealing with a proposed CUP special affairs reporter in Quebec City.

Alberta student leaders to meet

EDMONTON (CUP)—Fighting the tuition fee hike for foreign visa students and discussing expansion of the organization will be major topics at the Federation of Alberta Students (FAS) conference March 17-18, according to a FAS executive member.

Brian Mason said the conference will deal with the tuition question, by which the provincial government expects visa students to pay $300 more than Canadian students in university fees and $150 more for enrolment at Alberta's colleges. The federation has already sent information packets to MLA's and has looked into possible legal steps to combat the differential fee, he said.

The federation currently suffers from "a severe lack of facilities and resources," according to Mason.

Boy Scouts drop word 'boy'

SAN FRANCISCO (ENS-CUP)—The Boy Scouts of America have decided to drop the word 'boy' from their name. The group will now be known as "Scouting USA."

The National Boy Scout office, in a recent release, explained "the word 'boy' is objectionable to minorities" as well as to "our young adult leaders and, naturally, to the young women enrolled in our coed Exploring program."

But the Girl Scouts of the United States are not happy with the Boy Scouts move. The Girl Scouts, a separate organization which has no intention of changing its name, believes the Scouting USA will cause confusion.

"The identity of the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts is pretty firmly fixed in the minds of Americans. Now, if you use just the term 'Scouting,' people might think it's one big organization, and that ain't so," one Girl Scout spokesperson said.

Prof Noumoff to Speak

The Department of Political Studies announces two lectures on China by Professor Noumoff of the Department of Political Science, McGill University. On Wednesday, March 16, at 2:30pm, in Ellis Hall, Room 332 he will speak on "Integrated Rural Development in China". At 7:00pm in the Dunning Hall Conference Room he will give a short talk on Marxist-Leninism and the Development of Maoist Thought. Everyone interested in these topics is welcome to attend.

"Medical philosopher" to speak at Queen's

Dr. Howard M. Spiro, Professor of Medicine and Chief of the Gastrointestinal Section of Yale University, will deliver the eleventh annual W.T. Connell Memorial Lecture on Thursday, March 17. His address, entitled "A Visceral Viewpoint", will begin at 5:30pm in Etherington Hall, Queen's University.

As the author of a series of articles in the New England Journal of Medicine, Dr. Spiro has become a well-known medical philosopher, tackling many of the controversial issues related to the modern practice of medicine. He has had numerous scientific papers published and has written a textbook on clinical gastroenterology, now in its second edition.

Although his scientific contributions to gastroenterology are numerous, Dr. Spiro's great talent has been his broad and practical approach to clinical problems.

Dr. Spiro has been honoured with the Francis Blake Award as the Best Teacher of the Year, Yale University, 1971; Physician of the Year by the Connecticut Digestive Disease Society in 1973; and the National Achievement Award, National Foundation for Ileitis and Colitis in 1975.

The W.T. Connell Visiting

Dr. H. Spiro

Professorship was established in 1965 as a memorial to Dr. W.T. Connell (1872-1964) by the Queen's University Faculty of Medicine. Dr. Connell held the first Chair of Pathology and Bacteriology and later became the first full-time Professor of Medicine and Clinical Medicine until his retirement in 1940. He continued to lecture to students as Emeritus Professor until May 1949, when he completed 54 years of university teaching.

Research budget to grow

Minister of State for Science and Technology has announced an increase of $20 million (or 12 percent) to $181 million to support research in universities and non-profit institutions by National Research Council, Medical Research Council (MRC) and the Social Science and Humanities Research Program of Canada Council. The monies provide for inflationary increases in the cost of research supported by the Councils, and in addition, $8 million for programs relating especially to a regional balance of scientific capability, in national problem areas, and the support of inter-disciplinary research.

Medical Research Council grants and scholarship program estimates will be increased in addition to a $2 million supplementary estimate in 1976-7, by a further 12 percent to $56.7 million in 1977-8. Government funding for the support of social sciences and humanities research through the Canada Council will increase by 12 percent to $26.2 million.

Faculty

up to the responsibilities that perhaps they should have.

Dr. P. Bly, president of the Faculty Association, which represents about two-thirds of Queen's academic staff, said his organization was not initially aware that application of the referendum would be contingent on their eliciting a satisfactory response.

To gauge membership sentiment on the situation a questionnaire was circulated in May, 1976 to investigate the possibility of introducing a fee for users of the Pys Ed Centre to provide funds for "needed equipment replacement and the like." The questionnaire told members to recall that the students had already agreed to pay a universal fee of $7.50 per student.

The 20 percent response to the questionnaire was "strongly in favor" of a fee payable only by faculty who used the Phys Ed Centre. Mr. Bly explained that this position was conveyed during the negotiations but was rejected by the AMS.

"We understand the position of the AMS," he said, "but we couldn't get our membership to do that because that was not what they wanted."

A further opinion expressed by some association members was that application of such a users fee was "a dangerous precedent to make," and that such a method of fund raising might be extended to the library or computing centre or some other operation which the administration found pressure in budgeting for.

Dean MacIntosh (School of Pys Ed) declined to make a statement regarding the consequences of this loss of potential revenue on next year's budget and services, deeming the situation "too volatile" for comment.

Oswald Framed?

Warren report contested

by Robert Edward Porter
Did Lee Harvey Oswald kill President John F. Kennedy on Nov. 22nd, 1963, or was he merely framed - a "patsy" as he called himself - by the conspirators, or the authorities, or both? This is the question that Dr. Richard Bernabei of the Classics Department sought to answer last Saturday in Stirling Hall.

The talk, which included a short film of the assassination - a copy of the originally famed Zapruder film - and a series of slides was given to a capacity crowd in Lecture Theatre "D".

Professor Bernabei's contention is that Lee Harvey Oswald was framed "before and after the fact" (the assassination). The evidence presented included a comparison of two photos. One was a picture of Oswald, the other that of Oswald's head allegedly superimposed on the body of a man carrying a rifle and two leftist newspapers. Professor Bernabei claims that the latter is a "botch-up" job by the "real" conspirators, who wished to make Oswald appear to be a guntoter. His conclusion is based on a belief that the head of Oswald is not in proportion to the body of the gunman, and that one body is taller than the other (that of the "real" Oswald).

This evidence is at best inconclusive. One had the feeling that Professor Bernabei knew this as he fended off questions, ultimately moving along to cover "more important things".

Dr. Bernabei went on to the subject of the actual assassination, claiming that a bullet supposedly fired by Oswald which was retrieved in one piece from the stretcher of Texas Governor John Connally, could not have been fired, or at least could not have hit any hard object - "a bone or a cream-puff" - since it was a soft-nosed bullet which should have at least partially disintegrated upon impact. This was a fairly convincing piece of evidence - if Oswald did not fire the bullet, how did it get on the stretcher, why was it in one piece?

Various other pieces of "proof" included a discussion of the qualifications of the surgeon who performed the autopsy on JFK, the integrity of certain government officials and the identity of a mysterious "man in the door" of the building from which Oswald allegedly fired. All in all, a very interesting story, but...

Nothing was said that has not been said before. Professor Bernabei seemed to suspect everyone involved, from Oswald's wife to the members of the Warren Commission, of sins ranging from incompetence to out-and-out corruption. Many people have conjectured and hypothesized on the events of November 22nd, 1963, yet thus far little substantive proof has been drawn together to provide a credible alternative to the Warren Commission's one-bullet theory. Dr. Bernabei's opinions proved to be no exception.

One must give him credit for interest in the subject and for patiently answering most questions (although one soon tired of his claim that he could not remember so-and-so's name, having not dealt with this topic recently).

Alcan, Bank of Mtl, N.S. and Royal Named
Caribbean activity is criticized

Canadian banks and companies were criticized last Thursday night, by Selwyn Strachan of Grenada and Ronald Green of Dominica, for siphoning off the profits of the Caribbean countries and thereby contributing to the economic repression in the area.

Strachan cited as culprits such companies and banks as Alcan, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal and the Bank of Nova Scotia. Canadian companies buy up raw materials and sell the finished products back to the Caribbean countries, explained Strachan. For example, he said, while nutmeg, a product of Grenada, sells on the world market for $10.45 per pound, only $1.80 is paid to Grenadian producers. Green pointed out that for every dollar saved in the banks, only 20 cents remains in the Caribbean and that is rarely used for development.

Strachan also spoke of political repression, legal and violent, in the Caribbean, directed mostly against the press, and outlawed political groups.

Strachan is the organizational secretary of the New Jewel Movement, which, during the last election in Grenada, allied with two liberal parties and captured 48 percent of the vote. Green was instrumental in the foundation of the League of Socialist Workers in Dominica.

LFRC sums up the year

by Geoff Gomery

The Leonard Field Residence Council (LFRC) held its annual meeting Tuesday March 9, to consider the events of the year and pass on its work to the new council for 1977-78.

Gavin Laws, former Chairman of the LFRC, called it a successful year, and made a number of recommendations to the new council. In general, he called for more organization and communication with other student organizations and also asked for improved communications with the administration.

Other members commented on the responsibilities of their portfolios, and made recommendations for the future. The LFRC helps to organize all Leonard Field activities, including Wanderlust, the LFRC banquet, Inter-residence sports, and others, and has a voice in the food service and residence administration. After the chair was passed, the new chairman, John Sullivan, invited new members to submit requests for the various portfolios on the council, and considered new business. The council considered changes in the role of the Leonard Dining Committee, to improve upon communication with students.

but hope to grow

by Geoff Gomery

While the present Queen's Grad House is "by far the best Grad House so far," according to Vic Hugs, a member of the House Board of Directors, the Board and the management are looking hard for suggestions to improve it even further.

The Grad House, a three storey building located at 162 Barrie St., is run by students and is open to all graduate students, and to those who purchase a membership. The house is owned by Queen's, but run by Grad House Inc., a subdivision of the Graduates Students Society (GSS). The House Manager, Cathleen Burnett, is a part-time student.

The house offers grad students a place to gather and relax in various ways. Within the house there are areas available for reading, talking, playing chess, darts or other games, and watching TV. The house also contains lunch facilities, and a bar on the ground floor. According to Mr. Hugs, "next to the queen's pub we are the cheapest, and we have one of the best locals also."

Mr. Hugs describes the house as a good place for graduate students to meet fellows from different faculties and "talk about neighboring concerns, like sex and cars." House manager Cathleen Burnett emphasized that it was a place in which all could enjoy themselves in their own way.

Although there are about 800 graduate students at Queen's, the house only serves about 200 regular visitors. The present house actually the third Grad House, has only been officer is vested with the responsibility of ensuring that all polls are open at the hours and locations set out on posters giving notice of the election. The early closing was a breach of this provision.

The investigation, said Yearly, "revealed a much broader issue - namely the efficacy of AMS election procedure." "It is clear that the real 'culprit' in all this is the absence of any real voting system. The Chief Returning Officer is provided with no concrete direction" except for the very general bylaw in the AMS Constitution. Yearly hoped that a handbook could be written for the use of future Chief Returning Officers, based partly on the recommendations of Gregg Doyle and Ian Adams, who have each held the post for one year.

Yearly added that "the underlying problem is that everybody is getting slack over election procedures." In addition to the early poll closing, the Court was informed of a number of other improprieties which had occurred during the course of the February 9, 10 election-referendum in at least two instances, candidates (who were also AMS constables) were left in charge of polling stations. As well, many posters were in evidence on both days of voting.

Another instance of "slackness" was revealed in a separate, unpublicized AMS Court hearing and judgement on February 16, 1977. It was discovered that the acclaimed AMS executive had failed to comply with an AMS Constitution provision which requires that an itemized account of all election expenditures must be submitted to the Chief Electoral Officer at least 48 hours prior to the commencement of the election. The acclaimed Christie team apparently believed that the rule applied only in cases of an actual election. Upon the Court's request, an accounting of expenses was later made by the Christie team, and it appeared to the Court that "no evil was done by the candidates - non-compliance other than a technical infraction."

During the March 10 election hearing, Mike Yearly emphasized his disappointment at the small number of students who showed up, and his "extreme disappointment" at the approach of the executive of the AMS for not making an appearance or written submission. Yearly believes that it shows that the executive is "really not concerned" with the issue, and served to strengthen his belief that the Court was "relatively alone in caring whether the AMS election-referendums are run properly."

Houses: avoiding crisis

by Chris Hall

The student housing situation in Kingston is getting worse each year," stated Jodi Button, AMS Vice-President of University Affairs and Chairwoman of the AMS Housing Committee at the AMS Outer Council Meeting last Thursday March 10.

The committee, struck to formulate a response to the Paterson Report on housing conducted by the city of Kingston, reported that two major problems in student housing were missed by the Paterson Report: the quality of the residence and the availability of student housing.

A housing survey dealing with a number of areas including landlord responsiveness to repair requests and the degree of satisfaction with heating, structural soundness, and plumbing, was sent to 352 students residing off-campus. Over 53 percent of the surveys were returned. The survey results indicated that the majority of the students were satisfied with their present accommodation, but that many students were bothered by such irritants inconsistent regulation of heat, rotting foundations, and landlords who refused to correct problems with the houses before actual damage was incurred.

According to Ms. Button, the Paterson Report also suggested that there was no problem in availability of student housing. However, the Paterson Report failed to take into consideration "quasi-full-time students", students who are enrolled part-time academically, but are full-time occupants of houses. Furthermore, Leanne Mance residence, housing approximately 100 students, will not be available to the university next year, causing a further strain on the already overburdened housing market.

Outer Council intends to present the Housing Committee's report to city council in the hope that "the City might further investigate and review student housing in Kingston so as to combat possible problems before they arise," thereby avoiding any student housing crisis.

Co-ordination of the various levels of governments at Queen's have been tried and found wanting. The most recent example of this inefficient state of affairs came to light with the breakdown in negotiations between the Faculty Association and other user groups with regard to the implementation of an Athletic Facilities Users' Fee.

The University Council on Athletics (UCA) reported in the autumn of 1975 that an additional $100,000 was required for the Administration Budget which is allocated for such purposes as the cost of maintenance and repairs to the Physical Education Complex, the locker service and the provision of security. The UCA warned in its report, "Inflation and the Athletic Fee", that if such funds were not forthcoming the facilities could not be maintained at their current level.

Responding to the position outlined by the UCA, the Senate Committee on Student Affairs (SCOSA) recommended the institution of an Athletic Facilities Users' Fee of $7.50 to provide monies for the capital repairs and maintenance of the Phys Ed Complex. An integral feature of SCOSA's proposal was that students would furnish the administration fund with an additional $75,000 dollars contingent upon additional money ($25,000) being generated by a fee for Faculty and Staff use of the facilities.

Given the impending plight with respect to the maintenance of services offered at the Phys-Ed complex, the AMS acted swiftly to ensure that the Athletic Users' Fee question was placed on the November (1975) referendum. The concept was approved by students and thus it only remained for Faculty and other staff to provide their share.

Whereas the Staff Association, representing the Maintenance and other non-academic staff, subsequently agreed to pay a universal Users' Fee, the Faculty Association demurred. Over the past year and a half, it has failed to induce its members to come to terms with their responsibilities to contribute to the upkeep of facilities from which they derive considerable benefit. Consequently, the scheme designed to maintain the standard of athletic services at Queen's has been placed in perhaps irretrievable jeopardy.

For want of any suitable remedy, the ability of the Administrative Budget to cope with the situation has further deteriorated to the point where Principal Watts has announced the possibility of a reduction of services and economizing at the Phys-Ed Centre.

Vice-Principal Bonham and Dr. Bly, President of the Faculty Association are willing to offer no more than a murky picture of the Faculty Association's position in the negotiations which have taken place. Given the passage of time and the lack of information on the subject, one can only speculate as to the extent of the Faculty Association's initial commitment to the SCOSA plan.

The information which is available suggests that the Faculty Association has held little intention of committing its members to providing their share of the necessary $25,000. Certainly the results of a questionnaire handed out by the Faculty Association among its members last May might have revealed considerable support for a fee payable by Faculty who used the Phys-Ed Centre. Yet, as former AMS President Jamie Avis remarked, such an offer was scarcely realistic in terms of the amount of money which must be raised.

Dean MacIntosh of the School of Phys-Ed has diplomatically declined to remark upon the ramifications of the disintegration of the SCOSA plan owing Confrontation or compromise?

by Principal R.L. Watts

by R.L. Watts

Now that nearly three months have elapsed since the election of the Parti Quebecois in Quebec on November 15 the resulting issues confronting Canadians are emerging more clearly. To begin with, we are realizing that neither the Quebecois nor the rest of Canada can continue complacently to enjoy the illusions which previously dominated our thinking. One illusion is that Quebec will never opt for independence, and the other is that, if Quebec decides to leave, the divorce will be an easy one. The experience of other federations under similar stresses provides abundant warning about the unreality of such illusions and the pattern of emotional confrontation emerging during the last three months serves only to confirm this.

Any doubts that the Parti Quebecois is fully committed to independence of some form for Quebec have been dispelled. Moreover, it seems that in the battle for the minds and votes of Quebecers Rene Levesque holds significant strategic advantages. To begin with the fresh, energetic and competent PQ government, supported by a largely enthusiastic local press, is attracting the sympathy of a large body of Quebecers. More important, the PQ is in the position to control the timing and wording of any referendum. The PQ strategy is already apparent, every action will be tailored to the objective of convincing Quebecers to quit Confederation. Two stands of this strategy are evident. One is the heating up of confrontations and even contrived confrontations to convince Quebecers and other Canadians that independence would be preferable to the frustrations of Confederation. The second is to withdraw the participation of Quebec from the many voluntary intergovernmental arrangements upon which the effective operation of a federal system depends, and to replace active representatives by mere observers at federal-provincial meetings.

In the battle for Quebec independence the PQ are aided by a further major advantage. The disarray of the other political parties at both the provincial and federal levels. At the provincial level the Liberal Party is now virtually leaderless and lacks

...and now, on behalf of the staff of CBC Radio-Canada, this is Rex Goebbels bidding you a pleasant bon soir.

We invite you to join us in singing our provincial anthem: "Nous avons besoin d'un vrai pays" to the "volatile" nature of the situation. On the other hand, it would seem that the Faculty Association is not overly concerned.

The students of Queen's have offered an extra $75,000 in addition to the $250,000 they already give annually for the use and maintenance of the Phys-Ed Complex. The faculty pay nothing.

Where is the justice in that?

coherent policies on federalism and on the main socio-economic issues facing Quebec. At the federal level neither of the two major parties appears able to encompass the range of regional views across Canada and both have shown a tendency to seek to convert the Canadian crisis into opportunities for partisan advantage. In the 1860's when the Canadas faced a political crisis of similar proportions it was saved by the formation of a grand coalition when even George Brown was willing to pretend to be friends with Macdonald in order to achieve a resolution-Confederation. Today, the continued spirit of partisanship makes such an approach remote. It is not surprising, therefore, that there should be cries for non-partisan approaches such as the appointment of a special commission suggested by Claude Ryan or the holding of a Conference on National Unity advocated by H. Ian MacDonald.

Canada is clearly facing an unprecedented challenge to its unity. If we hope to surmount that challenge four points are crucial. First, no matter what the provocations, we must avoid the emotional polarization of positions which would make the search for rational accommodation and compromise impossible. Second, we must not fall into the trap of thinking that the status quo and Quebec independence are the only alternatives, but must seek a genuine compromise which will provide a symbolic recognition of the aspirations not only of Quebecers but of other alienated regional groups. Third, English-speaking Canadians will have to recognize the legitimacy of Quebec's linguistic, cultural and economic aspirations. A pro-Confederation majority in Quebec can only be preserved if Quebecers are at last convinced that Canada is just as much their country as anybody else's. Fourth, greater recognition of regional aspirations will not by itself hold Canada together unless we develop a wider sense of Canada Canada has much to offer not only to its English-speaking and French-speaking peoples but to the world at large if we can show how different linguistic and cultural groups can live not only in harmony but in active unity under a common government, an example the world desperately needs.

QHA offers 'other side'

Dear Editor:

For the past week, readers of the Whig-Standard may have been aware of a minor scandal which has devastated this small conservative town of 70,000 or so. It concerns the much stigmatized subject of

Homophobia at the King's Hotel

Dear Editor:

On Tuesday, March 1, ten or twelve people associated with Queen's Homophile Association paid a visit to Kingston's new disco bar, the King's, on Princess Street. It is natural and customary for gay people to dance with partners of the same sex, and this was done by several of our people. It was not long before the management intervened. We were told that men were not allowed to dance together. Women, however, could dance with other women. Such an attitude smacks of male chauvinism, are insignificant because every woman waits with baited breath for the man who will sweep her away. This assumption is, of course, false. Conversations with the management of the King's since the March 1 incident indicate that they now intend to prohibit all same sex dancing, whether it involves males or females.

Readers may wonder why gay people expect to be allowed to dance with members of the same sex in public. Heterosexuals have always taken for granted their right to express sexual preferences and physical affection in public. The expression of such preferences and affections is natural for homosexuals as well as for heterosexuals, and this is why we seek the right to engage in it publicly. We are no longer willing to hide this aspect of ourselves.

Gays who show their sexual orientation publicly are frequently accused of trying to convert the world. This is utterly false. Gays merely seek understanding and acceptance.

Another complaint against gays who do not hide their sexual orientation has become a stock phrase: "the love which dared not speak its name has become the love that will not shut up." But it is heterosexuals, not homosexuals, who have made sexual preference an issue. Judeo-Christian societies have placed great weight on it through their fearful and hateful persecution campaign against gay people. The decision to single out this small feature of our personalities as all-important was made by heterosexuals, not homosexuals. Our concern is to reject sexual preference as a valid ground for censure and persecution.

Queen's Homophile Association seeks to end homophobia and sexism. Public expression of our sexual preferences is necessary if these goals are to be realized. Therefore we deplore the oppressive actions taken by the management of the King's.

homosexuality. The series of articles which were shown on the pages of the Whig-Standard last week presented a slanted and one-sided view of a story which (like all controversies) has two sides. The students of Queen's are due an explanation, in short, the other side of the story.

In January of this year, while undertaking research for a Graduating Essay (entitled Homophobia: As perpetuated in the High School System), I approached the Physical Education teachers of six Kingston area high schools to find just exactly what material was being presented (or taught) to the students in the classroom concerning Human Sexuality and specifically Homosexuality.

To my dismay I found that in four of the six high schools, the literature which was used by the teachers as reference material, as well as various articles which were brought into the classroom were based on the conclusions of 'studies' done 20-25 years ago. In short, these 'studies' were carried out by a few psychoanalysts, one of whom, an American, Irving Bieber, studied 106 of his clinical patients who were homosexual (25 percent of whom were identified schizophrenics) to find parental traits and "causes" of homosexuality.

There were no control groups of healthy homosexuals or heterosexuals. Incredibly enough he concluded from these studies that all homosexuals were therefore "mentally" and "emotionally" ill and that homosexuality was "pathological" and a sign of "neurosis" and "psychosis" and should be "cured". In the nearly 25 years which have elapsed since Biebers remarkable "studies", Kinsey studied almost 20,000 American males, Wolfenden reported on thousands of people in Britain, and Hooker administered batteries of psychology and Personality tests on many thousands of people. All concluded that homosexuality was well within the range of normal behaviour and that in fact, it was just one facet of the wide spectrum of human sexuality (including heterosexuality, homosexuality, autosexuality and asexuality). Quite a few years ago, the American Psychiatric Association removed homosexuality from its list of illnesses. It acknowledged what gays and ambisexuals have been stating for so long—that homosexuality is not a psychological problem—it is a sociological one (of discrimination).

If people would open their minds and educate themselves by reading current, objective information from any source they would be in a position to make a fair judgment of this whole topic and the air would be cleared. Acceptance and understanding will never be gained (even in this pluralistic society) through the perpetuation of ignorance.

'Rundgren review shoddy, arrogant'

When you put your life down in those grooves, you're bound to get scratched up sometime. Todd Rundgren, Fair Warning, The Initiation Album.

Dear Editor:

Last week's performance of Todd Rundgren's Utopia was plagued with bad luck from start to finish. The timing was inappropriate, what with mid-terms and post reading-week bankruptcy enveloping most people. The location was laughable; the Memorial Centre is an acoustical nightmare. The choice of artist was unfortunate as Rundgren was obviously too avant-garde for Kingston audiences; a musical no-mind along the lines of Gino Vanelli would have probably packed the place and sent the fans home happy.

All of which brings us to the Rundgren review in last week's Journal, a fitting climax to the whole wretched episode. The only reason it might have appeared a "dress rehearsal" was because of the small crowd. Successful rock concerts require artist-audience communication, a link that was sadly lacking for two reasons. One, because of the extremely small crowd, and two, because of the 'progressive' (although I hate that word) nature of the music, which, as it involved more than a two-chord progression, left a majority of the audience puzzled and alone. "In the

Falling Dark."

The 'review' that graced your pages, motivated this effort, and it is to this great piece of critical journalism that we now turn. Not wishing to sound too critical, one major point stands out; the apparent lack of any knowledge whatsoever about Rundgren, his band, their history, and of course most importantly, their music. All the readers gleaned from the article was that the music was too loud (not really compared to most rock concerts), and that Todd Rundgren had not taken ballet lessons. Musical and technical proficiency were totally ignored as were any titles of any song, off any album that Rundgren has been associated with. This ignorance however helped to pave the way for the self-indulgence the reviewer's poison pen.

The sound system was very clear, the building was the problem.

Opening-gig difficulties were to be expected as Utopia was operating with a brand new road crew. Also the two laser-beams, the show's most impressive visual effect were rendered inoperative by the Memorial Centre's advanced electrical system. Are we also to expect Rundgren and Co. to carry around a generating station with them when they tour? No mention was made of the length of the concert, a two-and-a-half hour concert preceded by a 20 minute video-synthesis, good value in these days of inflation. Most artists of Rundgren's stature would have been out of the Memorial Centre and on their way to the bank by 10:30.

Therefore, would it be asking too much, before we start nailing artists to the wall, that we become familiar with their work?

Gross injustice to ignore band's musical talent

Dear Editor:

In reference to your review of Todd Rundgren in the March 8 issue of your paper, we, as members of the audience would like to voice our own opinions. We feel that gross injustices have been done regarding what we felt to be a truly magnificent musical performance.

Admittedly, there were technical flaws which had not been ironed out, but the delivery of the music was highly professional, and certainly a great deal less "shoddy and arrogant" than was your review. We feel that it was unfair to ignore the musical prowess of the band in favor of criticizing the technical effects presented in a town which could not provide a sufficient power supply to enable Todd Rundgren to effectively draw upon the full potential of his act.

A concert is often what an audience makes it. The lack of enthusiasm from this audience (who could not even clap at the end of songs) is well depicted by Mr. Hughes when he refers to the heckling comment from the audience (i.e. play) "something decent". In view of a response such as this it is a wonder that Rundgren maintained the high caliber performance displayed.

It may be interesting to note that not one of us had been previously exposed to much Rundgren and therefore attended the concert with no expectations or preconceptions. We returned very much satisfied with the concert, our gratification undiminished by the long troublesome journey from the Memorial Centre so vividly described by Mr. Hughes.

We respectfully submit that perhaps in future you could provide your readers with more competent reviewing, leaving Mr. Hughes free to spend his evenings at home with "The Gong Show" or Gilligan's Island.

"Support your concerts" urges Agency

QEA explains concert losses

Dear Editor:

This letter is being written to clear up a few misconceptions concerning the Todd Rundgren concert in particular and the Queen's Entertainment Agency (QEA) in general.

As all of you probably know, the QEA subsidized approximately $11,000 on the Todd Rundgren date. Some students seem to feel the fault lies with the choice of location, the Kingston Memorial Centre, and the manner in which the concert was promoted. Others feel that the choice of the artist was, perhaps, at the root of the problem.

To begin with, the QEA did attempt to get the Jock Harty Arena for the Rundgren show. QEA was told that because of previous commitments of arena time, in this case: recreational skating and regular classes, this would be impossible. We had no other place to go except the Memorial Centre, we would have much preferred the Jock Harty Arena, but we had to settle for an alternative location. (It is important to remember that the George Carlin and Santana concerts were booked two months in advance to ensure the Arena would be available for those dates.)

When examining how the concert was promoted two things must be kept in mind. The first thing is that the Rundgren date was not confirmed until Wednesday, February 16, which left only 14 days to promote the concert. The second thing is that Reading Week comprised seven of those 14 days.

A common criticism of the promotion is that the posters were nearly unreadable. The general policy of the QEA is for the promotion manager to O.K. a draft of the poster before it goes to print. In this case, the initial O.K. was given strictly on seeing the type face that was to be used, since a rough draft of the poster could not be prepared in such a short period of time. The artist, without the benefit of any promotional material to guide him, did the best job he could with the little time he was allowed. When the posters came off the press, the concert had grown too close to re-do the posters and so they were used.

The cancellation of the Tuesday (March 1) Journal presented another difficulty to campus advertising. We were left with only our Whig-Standard and Golden Words advertising. In addition, 6500 leaflets advertising the show were distributed on Campus. The show was also plugged heavily on CKLC and CFRC. It was, and still is, the view of the QEA that, given the speed at which the promotion needed to be done and the difficulties of doing that promotion, the Rundgren concert was promoted as well as could be expected.

Some students seem to feel that Todd Rundgren was not a particularly wise choice to bring to Queen's. They also feel that the timing of the recent concerts (four within a relatively short period) was a contributing factor to the loss in the Rundgren concert.

The drawing power of Todd Rundgren concert be doubled in Toronto and in many U.S. centres, he has sold out shows (15,000 tickets) in as little as 3 hours.

Knowing this, it is not inconceivable that in Kingston one should be able to sell 3,000 tickets in two weeks. The QEA felt that it could and it was justified in doing so. Some students say that if only the QEA brought "good" groups to town they would have no problem selling out concerts. All we can say to that is this. The QEA has brought David Bromberg, Jesse Winchester, Oscar Peterson and Bruce Cockburn, among others, to Queen's and has not completely sold out one show. Not one. It is not that there is a shortage of talent being brought to Queen's, it is that Queen's people don't seem to be going to concerts.

A word on the financing of concerts is appropriate here. The QEA starts off each year with a budget financed by $3.00 from every student (included in the student fees). This money is not accumulated from year to year, i.e. it must all be spent in the current academic year. The vast majority of concerts must be subsidized by this fund given the fact that expenses usually exceed gate receipts. Our policy is to stage as many concerts as possible, appealing to as wide a variety of musical tastes as possible. If there is enough money left at the end of the year, we can afford to subsidize bigger concerts, e.g. Santana and Rundgren.

Our efforts this year were largely hampered by the lack of an office due to construction in the Student Union Building. Hopefully this situation will have been remedied by next year. Until then, if you have any inquiries, complaints, or advice, please leave a note in the QEA box in the AMS office.

Support your concerts!

An understandable myth...

Are lawyers really dishonest?

by Howard Smith

Basically lawyers are dishonest. So goes the common public sentiment about legal counsel. The "dishonesty" alleged isn't really of the worst kind. No one expects the average lawyer to be a thief, embezzler or outright liar. Few however hesitate to call the lawyer devious and cunning. Perhaps the reason people think this way goes to the feeling that if you can get a lawyer to argue almost anything he must have no principles. After all, how can he defend you if he would have been equally willing to sue you if he'd seen the other guy first? Worse yet, how can he defend a man who admits he's guilty? In each case isn't the lawyer arguing something he doesn't believe.

The question of what the lawyer believes is central to this matter. The court system is devised to make decisions. Centuries of experience and mindbending have gone into the process which allows that system to make the fairest judgments. The lawyer in any court doesn't make the decision - he is only a cog in the mechanism of adjudging. For him to refuse a person representation is for him to deny that person a "crack" at the social machinery set up to make decisions fairly. If all lawyers uniformly refused to argue a case, they'd be setting themselves up as judges - taking over the role of the court. It is a lawyer's obligation not to make final "judgments", but to present, as well as he can, your side of the story. All the time he knows the guy on the other side is going to paint the blackest picture possible. The judge (in some cases, the jury), not the advocates, draws the conclusions. Thus the lawyer is leaving the judgment to the court when he represents you.

Well then, what about a man who admits he's guilty? Surely then the lawyer is not making a judgment if he refuses to act for the client - the client made the judgment. The client however is not a lawyer. He may know the facts, but does he know the law? Maybe he did fail to save a drowning man, but would his conclusion that he "killed" him be correct? Even if the client is "correct" in suggesting he is "guilty", a lawyer has interests other than those of the client to take to heart.

"Guilty" is a legal term - it means legally culpable - at fault through process of law. The process that determines guilt is very crucial. To demonstrate why, imagine a case where you could be convicted of a crime without ever being given an opportunity to defend yourself. The police just swoop down one dark evening, and throw you in a dungeon for thirty years, muttering something about your guilt as found at a trial you'd heard nothing about. What about a case where the prosecution succeeds at trial on the grounds of testimony given by a person who says he heard the defendant did it? How would you respond if you were "put away" for a 20 year old crime that Parliament has said cannot be acted upon after two years has elapsed. In all of these cases, each and every one of us is having his legal rights encroached by the state. Just as much as the mugger or the villain can be a threat to your liberty, so can the actions of an arbitrary state. The mere threat of some evil consequence is often as much of a "hassle" as the thing itself. Think of what women are forced to do by the threat of rape. Most women have not been raped, yet most women don't go to certain places, don't venture out at certain hours, can't wear some types of clothing and refrain from acting in specific ways. The threat of arbitrary laws, like the threat of rape, deeply affects a person's liberty. So you see the lawyer has a duty to make the prosecution prove their case. No matter that the defendant says he's guilty, the prosecution must show that our legal standards of guilt are met. Thus even where a defendant pleads guilty, the prosecution must present its evidence to the satisfaction of the court. The upshot of this standard is that all of us can be assured of "due process of law" and protection from the dangers of both criminals and arbitrary criminal standards.

So you see, when the lawyer is willing to argue for black or for white, when he will defend the "guilty" man he does so out of an understanding of the legal system.

Far from dishonesty, his sentiments turn upon his conviction in the worth of the trial process in making fair decisions and the importance of legal standards to our personal liberties.

What Rhodesia and Uganda have in common: terrorism

by Ross Sutherland

From a reading of the papers in the last month the following separate incidents emerged that bear some reflection.

Idi Amin has become the centre of humanitarian concern. A sure sign of this is that Ben Wicks must have drawn at least twenty macabre cartoons featuring this stereotype of a big, aggressive, black bullock - a near perfect racist image. Amin's atrocities rank high among the worst in the world and are probably tops for blatancy. Obviously moves to end this reign of terror should be welcomed. My own misgiving is that in the last four years the Chilean regime has probably killed and tortured equal numbers of people in more indefensible circumstances. It seems note-worthy that a black-man who is likely quite sick deserves greater attention than calm, calculating white men.

A short while ago the Globe and Mail ran a front page story on Black Terrorist murdering missionaries in Zimbabwe (alias, Rhodesia). Last Saturday in a story on page 11 it reported that church leaders in Zimbabwe felt that the murders had not been committed by the black nationalists, but probably by the commando unit of the Rhodesian army. This typically fair and 'objective' reporting should be of some comfort to the Smith regime. The Black Nationalists (alias Terrorists) will just have to continue fighting against the Smith regime and its allies.

Last Friday amid a detailed and convincing presentation on the physical (eg tortures) and legal repression in South Africa two more economic links between that country and Canada were mentioned. Updating 1973 involvement, it was mentioned that four leading Canadian banks (Commerce, Royal, T-D, and Montreal) lent $300 million dollars to the South African regime last year. Secondly they mentioned that 3-4 of the sugar used in Canada - which from a subjective evaluation is a hell of a lot of sugar - comes from South Africa. Sadly these are only more drops in the bucket. Canadian companies (for example Falconbridge, Noranda and Sun Life) have played a long and active role in effectively supporting this racist and repressive regime.

Last week the most recent episode in the Gunder-Frank and people vs the Canadian Government saga started to gear down. Largely thanks to the poor and politically impotent response from Queen's administration, faculty and students, the government was able to deny freedom of speech and movement in an arbitrary fashion. Though it is questionable how arbitrary the decision was. Among other things it seems like another blatant manifestation of an immigration procedure that actively discriminates on the basis of politics. To my mind one of the most shocking examples of this was the different responses to political refugees from Chile and Vietnam. After much hassle two hundred Chileans were let into Canada because their lives were threatened by the fascist government. 3,000 Vietnamese, numerous of highly dubious character (known dope-smugglers and corrupt government officials) were welcomed when the communists took over. No matter what your sources, it would be hard to argue that dissidents in Chile were in less danger than in Vietnam. It will be noteworthy to see how the immigration department treats the White Rhodesian emigrants.

It would be easy to say that it had been a tough month for progressive forces and movements related to the third world. Sadly this is typical of Canada's consistently regressive role in supporting racist and repressive regimes. If nothing else it is cause for serious reflection.

Expenses weren't submitted: but Exec. needn't forfeit their team's acclamation

A.M.S. Court

Re: Acclamation of Executive Candidates, 1977. Hearing and Judgement, February 16, 1977. Unanimous Decision of the Court consisting of Mike Yearsley, C.J., Brian Newby, A.C.J., Mike Mimms, J., Linda Mollenhauer, J., Deb McGuire, J. Written reason by Brian Newby, A.C.J.:

The following judgement results from a reference by the Chief Electoral Officer brought before the Court at the February 16, 1977 sitting. The reference regarded a suspected infringement of election procedures as set out by By-Law 10 of the A.M.S. Constitution by the candidate team of Hugh Christie, Gord Howe and Judy Button during the recent A.M.S. executive election.

Section 4(a) of By-Law 10 reads:

Campaign materials used in support of the election campaign of candidate or team of candidates including all gifts and contributions shall not have a retail market value greater than seventy-five dollars ($75.00). The Chief Electoral Officer shall be fully empowered to decide upon said market value by whatever methods he/she considers just and proper. An itemized account of all expenditures must be submitted to the Chief Electoral Officer or to his appointed delegate, as least forty-eight hours prior to the commencement of the election.

A description of the nature of those accounts follows but is not necessary to reproduce. Section 4(c) of By-Law 10 then continues:

Any candidate or persons acting on behalf of the candidate or team of candidates who exceeds the seventy-five dollar maximum or who fails to comply with By-Law No. 10-4(a) shall be required to withdraw from the election by the Chief Electoral Officer.

It was suggested that the candidate team failed to provide such an itemized account and the issue was then raised as to whether they should be prevented from taking office as the new A.M.S. Executive. It was noted that the candidates were to take office by acclamation, that no accounting was pursuant to section 4(a), and thus section 4(c) might be found to apply. The candidates contended that because an acclamation had taken place there had been, in fact, no "election," and hence that section 4 was inapplicable. "Election" is nowhere defined in the A.M.S. Constitution and accordingly, the word's meaning was subject to interpretation by the Court. The interpretation suggested by the candidates was that election implies choice, and since there was but one slate of candidates, no choice, and hence no election, could take place.

The Court felt that, as a general rule of interpretation, the meaning given to a word must be in keeping with the purpose behind enacting the section in the first place, such that the meaning given to that word would not do violence to the carrying out of the enacted purpose. Union deliberation it was concluded that the principle guiding section 4 was the avoidance of unfair polling advantage to candidates based on unequal economic support. While these candidate's literal interpretation was not one that the word "election" could not bear, the Court decided that in light of the enacted purpose it might not be the appropriate meaning. Conceivably, if one candidate spent enough money on publicity early in the election campaign, other candidates not prepared to campaign as extensively might be intimidated to an extent leading them to drop out. An acclamation situation could arise in such a manner. While on the literal or "choice" interpretation of "election", no election would have taken place; quite clearly considerable violence would have been done to the purpose behind section 4. Accordingly, the Court voiced some doubt as to the acceptability of the Executive team's contention expressing a preference for a broader interpretation.

The Court found, however, that a determination of the interpretation issue was not necessary to the determination of the complaint before it, and as a result, will refrain from making a binding determination as to the meaning of "election" as found in By-Law 10. A decision without reference to the facts behind a complaint is perhaps as arbitrary as a judicial decision without reference to the law which so governs. Upon examining evidence brought before the Court, it became apparent that no evil was done by the candidates' non-compliance with section 4 other than the technical infraction. The candidates made an accounting of expenses to the Court upon the Court's request. Such expenses were basically zero. The non-compliance in no way appeared to affect the running of the executive election. On the other hand, an ousting of the candidates from office would be seen to be of a severity out of proportion to the censure warranted by the circumstance, and would in itself be seen as unjust. On the basis of the circumstances involved, then, the Court has approved the acclamation.

Notwithstanding this decision, the candidates are deserving of some censure. The infraction involved a straight forward election rule found within the A.M.S. Constitution. The candidates involved are now President and Vice-Presidents of the Alma Mater Society. As such, one might suggest that they have a responsibility to be familiar with the Constitution of the organization which they oversee. To be fair, the candidates stated that they were familiar with the section but felt that under the circumstances it did not apply to them, but perhaps it is worse for the Executive to interpret the Constitution as they see fit than to disregard it. It seems an illusory line that exists between executive contempt by disregard for recognized procedures and contempt by the executive in taking it upon themselves to decide when such procedures apply.

Polling problems for February vote:

Court decides no option--ruling made to do it all over again March 23-24

Re: February 1977 Elections/Referenda.

Initial hearing: February 16, 1977 - adjourned for further information.

Reconvened: March 2, 1977 - adjourned for public hearing.

Public hearing: March 9, 1977 - Matter concluded.

Unanimous opinion of the Court Consisting of Michael Yearsley, Brian Newby, A.C.J., Mike Minns, J. Linda Mollenhauer, J.

Written reasons by M. Yearsley:

General

The Affairs of the A.M.S. are governed by the A.M.S. Constitution. In particular as regards the present matter, Bylaw 10 of the constitution governs the elections and referenda, and Bylaw 11 governs the Court.

Jurisdiction

Section 1 of Bylaw 10 reads as follows: The A.M.S. Court shall be responsible for the administration of all A.M.S. Elections and Referenda. The Chief Justice of the A.M.S. Court shall be the Chief Electoral Officer. The language here is imperative; the Court is commanded to exercise this administrative responsibility. The jurisdiction of the Court in this regard is reiterated in Subsection 9 (30) of Bylaw 11.

The present matter comes to the court's attention via section 7 of Bylaw 10. One of the student members of the A.M.S., in compliance with the provisions of this section, directed a complaint to the Chief Electoral Officer, who, in turn, referred the matter to the court at large for its consideration as anticipated by section 1.

Issues

The original complaint gave rise to a rather narrow issue: namely, the alleged early closing of the Leonard polling station on Thursday, February 10. However, the Court's inquiry into this narrow issue revealed a much broader issue: namely, the efficacy of A.M.S. election procedure generally.

Facts

The facts regarding the narrow issue are clear and uncontested. The Chief Returning Officer acknowledges the early closing of the Leonard polling station as alleged.

This much, then, the Court knew as of its initial hearing in this matter, February 16. The Court's immediate response was to suspend the results of the elections and referenda pending further investigation. Following a further unpublishing sitting March 2, the Court decided to seek still additional information from the Campus at large; and an appeal to this effect was publicized in the March 4 edition of the Journal. The public hearing, March 9, concluded the matter.

During the course of its inquiry, the Court was informed of a number of improprieties that had occurred during the February elections referenda. For example, the Leonard polling station reportedly closed early on February 9 as well, as did that at Ban Righ. Moreover, in at least two instances, candidates were left in charge of polling stations. A more general complaint regarded the many posters that were still in evidence on both days voting - both on behalf of candidates and in support of referenda opinions.

Decision

None of this additional data is necessary to ground the Court's decision on the narrow issue--the February elections/referenda were invalid, and must be re-run.

The Court has investigated the matter exhaustively, and has explored every avenue that it thought might provide some alternative to this conclusion. None could be found.

The matter is governed by the Constitution. Section 2 of Bylaw 10 gives the Chief Returning Officer complete discretion regarding most aspects of elections and referenda, including choice of hours and location of polls. However, subsection (a) of section 3 imposes an absolute limit to this discretion as follows:

(a) It shall be the duty of the Returning Officer to ensure that the polls are open at the hours and locations set out on posters giving notice of the election. The Court is compelled to find that this provision has been breached. The Chief Returning Officer knowingly closed the Leonard polling station early on February 10. He did so apparently without recalling sub-section 3 (a); but that cannot cure the defect. In exercising its responsibility under section 1 of Bylaw 10, the Court feels that it has no option--it must declare the results invalid.

Recommendations: As a practice matter, the Court believes that the elections referenda should be re-run as soon as practicable. The court must be careful not to infringe the constitutional discretion of the Chief Returning Officer. However, it offers the following recommendations:

Compliance with Bylaw 10 and observance of Journal publication schedules combine to suggest March 23 as the appropriate date; voting should be a one-day proposition. The elections referenda should be run more or less as before with certain obvious modifications. Each poll should be manned by a poll clerk throughout the time scheduled for that station to be open. The times should be published in the Journal, by poster, and otherwise as required, and should be carefully co-ordinated so that each poll opens and closes exactly on time. Closing should refer to the ballot box - i.e. after the publicized time expires, no further ballots should be inserted into the box or otherwise given effect in any way. A poll clerk should not be a candidate or have any obvious stake in the outcome of the voting. Constables are very suitable as poll clerks, since they appear to be above reproach; however, there is no constitutional requirement that a poll clerk be a constable. Ballots should be distinctive from last time.

Some additional points: The Chief Returning Officer should see that every candidate receives a copy of Bylaw 10. Candidates and referenda propagandists are requested to refrain from publicity efforts. The effect of the Court's decision is to return to the campus the morning of February 9 with respect to the elections/referenda. The nomination and campaigning are not being questioned, and are deemed to have been fair and proper (if not, complaints should have been made at that time). In order that no candidate or cause gain an unfair advantage at this time, no further campaigning should ensue.

One consequence of this request, if complied with, is to reduce potential hardships to all concerned. As regards Candidates, of course, it is open to anyone who does not want to contest position to withdraw or concede. This is only an observation, not a recommendation. In any event, it is assumed that successful Candidates will take office after March 23 in accordance with the practice of their respective societies. Meanwhile, the Court reiterates its request, already published in the March 4 edition of the Journal, that the people previously in office in the affected societies remain so until their successors are properly inaugurated.

Additional Observations: It is clear that the real "culprit" in all this is the voting system itself, more to the point, it is the absence of any real system. The Chief Returning Officer is provided with no concrete direction apart from Bylaw 10, which is very general to begin with, and poorly constructed in addition (like so much of the Constitution). Both the present Chief Returning Officer and his predecessor have agreed to offer written submissions to A.M.S. Executive during the summer outlining the system understood it to exist and recommendations as to appropriate. The court suggests other A.M.S. members who contribute meaningfully in this should do so as well. Then hopefully in the fall, the Constitutional Review Committee will endeavour to ensure that a handbook of procedure is drawn up for the guidance of those in charge of elections and referenda in the future. Such a guideline doubtless would be modified from time to time to conform to changing circumstances and priorities, and hence would provide exactly the sort of guidance that is so conspicuously absent at present. Indeed every A.M.S. Commission and each of its functionaries should have some such on going directive.

Of course, no system is immune to the possibility of oversight and unconscious error. The Court itself ran into such a problem during the enquiry when one of its Justices pointed out that she had been a candidate herself in the election. Since the Court's Bylaw 10 jurisdiction was called into operation with respect to those same elections, obvious conflict-of-interest dangers arose. Fortunately, the Court is structured so as to enable it to accommodate just such a circumstance by having the Justice refrain from participation in the decision making, which is what occurred in this instance.

Mike Yearsley

Because of this complication within its own structure, the Court is all the more keenly aware of the complexities that an organization as extensive as the A.M.S. by focussing on this Achilles' heel. One is apathy, the other is adavance.

Berger report due

Mackenzie Valley Pipeline final decision

by Collin Gribbons, CUP

OTTAWA (CUP)—Although the final report of Justice Tom Berger's report on the socio-economic effects of a proposed MacKenzie Valley Pipeline is expected in April the final decision whether to build the pipeline or not will rest with the federal government. And the oil and gas industry is not going to sit back and meekly allow the government to heed Berger's advice.

The energy consortium which wants the pipeline built is very much alive and well — and active. Over a year of hard campaigning by Native people and their supporters, who did want to see the Mackenzie Valley pipeline built, or who wanted a moratorium on resource-extraction in the area, has swung public opinion in favour of the Dene and Inuit. The consortium is preparing counter-

Berger makes his final decision, he may be out-ripped on a number of sides. And even though he is a politician of consummate skill, Berger may be holding all the eggs in the anti-pipeline basket — and that could be dangerous.

We now have reached a point where virtually the only line of defence against the MacKenzie Valley pipeline is that of Thomas Berger.

Already, one of the major defensive lines has been broken. The organizations representing northern Native people have been split in four ways. The first split surfaced in August, when the Indian Brotherhood and the Metis Association of the Northwest Territories came to blows over a proposed agreement in principle on their land claims.

The Brotherhood, representing status Indians, said it wanted an agreement with the Canadian government whereby the latter would recognize the Indians' aboriginal rights. Loosely-defined, aboriginal rights allow the Native people to use and occupy their lands in a way consistent with their own culture, as they have done for hundreds of years. The Brotherhood says Indians have suffered under southern colonialism for centuries; that the financial interests have been taking profits from the land while Native people received none of the benefits. The status Indians want an end to that system of exploitation.

In their proposed agreement in principle with the government over their land claims, the Brotherhood called for a separate government for the Indians of the Northwest Territories. The Indians do not want compensation for the loss of their lands: they have said time and time again that their land is not for sale. Rather, they want to continue the development and growth of their own culture. And they want the people of the north to reap the benefits from any northern industrial activity.

The Metis Association, however, has abruptly reversed its previous stand. Ever since land claims were discussed in the north, the Metis Association had stood solidly with the Brotherhood in its opposition to control northern development. And, in a precedent-making move, the two groups announced they would file a joint land claim.

Then James Wah-Shee was deposed as President of the Brotherhood, and there was muttering heard of collusion with the oil interests. He was replaced last summer by Georges Erasmus, an anti-colonialist and outspoken opponent of the oil companies.

Suddenly, trouble started with the Metis Association. A meeting at Camp Antler, near Yellowknife, in June widened a developing split between the leadership of the two organizations. The Metis executive refused to participate in a joint meeting to ratify the proposed land settlement agreement in principle in August, and the split was made public.

The Metis Association says it wants the pipeline built when the land claims are settled.

And the Metis Association said it would submit a separate land claim in the Mackenzie Valley, even as the Brotherhood was presenting its own to Indian and Northern Affairs Minister Warren Allmand.

The Brotherhood has claimed that the Metis Association no longer represents the view of the Metis in the Northwest Territories. Indeed, many Metis have supported the Brotherhood's position.

Now, the Inuit are also split. Coincidentally, the split came right after the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada (ITC) announced it was withdrawing its earlier, conciliatory, land claim and replacing it with a much tighter one.

COPE (the Committee for Original People's Entitlement), ITC's affiliate in the western Arctic, announced in late December that it too would pursue its own claim, in the hope of obtaining a quick settlement.

OIL AND GAS COMPANIES

The oil and gas companies, for now, are maintaining a low public profile. Aside from the television commercials telling us they need all the profits they can reap in order to explore for new sources of oil in the Arctic, they have not been saying much about the pipeline.

For example, Canadian Arctic Gas is maintaining this low profile while it seems, gearing up their public relations machinery. Several months ago, all of the organizations which presented briefs during the southern swing of the Berger Commission received an information kit telling them why the pipeline is a good thing.

The multinational energy giants could be gearing up for battle. Or they could be softening up the public for the inevitable.

WHO WILL REALLY MAKE THE FINAL DECISION ON MACKENZIE VALLEY?

What of the federal government? In the end, it will be the government which makes a final decision on the pipeline.

It will do so on the advice of the National Energy Board, the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, the Berger Commission, the US government (which favors a Mackenzie Valley pipeline to transport gas to the energy-hungry midwest) and probably a host of other agencies.

The National Energy Board (NEB) will have an important role to play in advising the government. So far, the NEB's performance has been less than shining. Its chairman was caught in an oil company-run fishing camp last year, for instance. Some embarrassment ensued. But that was only the tip of the iceberg.

It was the NEB which, up until a couple of years ago, was telling us that Canada had enough oil reserves to last for centuries. Then, however, the oil companies changed their estimates, and the NEB (which gets its data directly from the companies) swiftly followed suit. Now, the estimates seem to be changing every month. In short, no one knows how much oil Canada has left, least of all the NEB.

Coincidentally, the NEB, which has been holding hearings for some months on the feasibility of the pipeline, will start investigating the socio-economic implications of the pipeline at the same time as the Berger Commission makes its report. So there is a possibility of the Berger report being outflanked politically on yet another front. The NEB, which has a pro-industry reputation, will certainly say that the socio-economic effects will not be so great as to favor a decision not to build the pipeline.

So Justice Berger holds all the anti-pipeline cards right now, and that is a dangerous situation. After all the press the Berger Commission received, it seemed many Canadians were willing to sit back and let Berger do all the work. If the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline is to be stopped, that situation must change within the next several months.

Spenserian Sonnets

freestyle

In age I place my words beneath a flower,
Yet runs the sun and withers up my name,
Once more I sketch the handleless faceless hour,
Runs human storms, blooms killed before I came,
Lost faith, voice, love, from war to war the same,
A universal child is born, set free,
And I shall always move through mortal games
My inner ear shall hear a shoreless sea,
This marble tomb, this earth, beyond to see,
To send the stars thus reach my distant flame,
My songs, your voices, yearning fantasies,
And on the waves we paint the nameless name,
Where outlawed ends, transcend atomic dust,
Love's stories will cycle, space ships must.

I wander through the meadows of love's mind,
A radio-active dust of tunes of sand,
I walk along the shores to find,
Detergent sea, a poem in love's soured land,
I float through islands of love's sweet rain,
The infra-red, the flames, the link of rain,
I wade in hope, spring waters to cool the land,
The garbage lakes, mercurial fish, goodbye,
I try so hard to save love's poem, love's time,
Yet science killed the joyous similes,
I try in visions love's eternal time,
Are sonnets victims of technology,
Now my love and I seek astral flight,
To find new poems beyond a mortal night.

Stuttgart Chamber Orchestra

warmth, mastery, and sense of completeness

The world renowned Stuttgart Chamber orchestra will perform tonight (Tuesday March 15) at 8:30 p.m. in Grant Hall. Under the direction of Karl Meunchiger, the orchestra's performance of works by Bach, Pachelbel, Strauss and Britten will continue a long line of successful concert appearances that began, under the same baton, in 1945.

The S.C.O. has made countless tours of Europe, North America, South America, the Orient and South Africa in the intervening 30 odd years. Among their many noteworthy appearances have been the Vienna Festival, the Holland Festival and others around the world. They have also recorded on the London label.

The Washington Post has referred to their "tone of luminous warmth, a complete technical mastery. Above all they seemed to bring a sense of completeness to this music that made each work all you could ask for." They have also been called "superb", "imaginative", "aristocratic" and "brilliant".

Tickets for tonight's concert are available from the Performing Arts Box Office or at the door at Grant Hall.

Queen's Jazz Ensemble

Paying respects to jazz

Queen's Jazz Ensemble, under their director David Smith will play two concerts on Thursday, March 17: at 12:30 noon and 8:30 p.m. in Grant Hall. As a warm-up they will also play a short program at the Queen's Pub on March 16 at 9:30 p.m.

The bash on March 17 will feature some recent arrangements from the libraries of Count Basie and Woody Herman, as well as a Paul Shilton composition ("Paying Respects") and

"Screech, Rhythm and Punch" written by this year's pianist Victor Sawicki.

One of the basic elements of jazz is improvisation and some of the instrumentalists who demonstrate a fine ability in this respect are Terry Marek, trumpet; Bob Frayne and Mike Calich, tenor sax; and Mike Andrews, alto sax. The rhythm section which includes Clyde Dawson, bass, and Peter Dobbins, guitar, and Andrew Trott, drums has been expanded to include another percussionist, Greg Runions. Peter Tomblin will be trombone soloist in "Tall-Cotton" - a swinging Basie-style tune. Vocalist Maura McGroarty who first appeared with the band last year, just recently undertook an audition for the C.B.C.'s Department of Talent Development who forecast the possibility of a great future for her.

Come early, experience has shown that the Jazz Ensemble concerts tend to fill Grant Hall to capacity. Admission is free, but in order to assist the ensemble to acquire new "charts" and make more off-campus appearances.

Queen's Rock Ensemble

Original rock in the Underground

by Jim Hipkin

Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights this week there is live music in the Underground. This special event is made possible by the AMS and the Underground. Composers-Musicians Paul Shilton (Keyboards) and Frode Nielson (Guitar) will be performing some of their best music starting at 10:00 each night. They will be backed by the Queen's Rock Ensemble.

Paul Shilton received his B. Music from Queen's in 1976 and is currently musical director at Theatre 5. His experience includes playing with two professional horn bands and goes back to the Queen's Jazz Ensemble, which he played with while at Queen's. Several of his compositions have been performed by the Jazz Ensemble and one of them, Paying Respects, will be played in the Ensemble's concert this Thursday. The Jazz ensemble will be doing a short set in the pub Wednesday night at 9:30.

Frode Nielson is equally qualified. He is much in demand as a guitar player and has played in bands in Toronto and Kingston. He presently plays in Rick Fondell's Fun Band out of Kingston. In the summer you will find Frode playing guitar on the Island Queen. Frode is finishing his fourth year at the B.Music programme here. His works have been performed by the Queen's Choral Ensemble, the Queen's Summer Singers and various smaller groups around the Campus. He has also written many pieces for the various bands he has worked in.

The Q.R.E. was put together specifically for this concert. It includes some of the finest talent around Queen's and has been carefully rehearsed for this event by Paul and Frode. It is a 9-piece show band which includes a full horn section. Mary Picot is the lead vocalist. Paul Shilton will play electric piano and Frode Nielson will play electric guitar. Bass is provided by Dave Whittom and Rich Bannard will play drums. The horn section includes Ted Simmonet, tenor, Mike Andrews, alto, Blain Workman trumpet and Pete Tomblin trombone.

Visiting choir from Guelph

The University of Guelph Choir will visit Kingston on Saturday, March 19 to give a performance of choral music in Grant Hall at 8:30 p.m. Admission is free.

Composed of 65 members, the choir will sing a widely varied program spanning several centuries. Works by Schutz, Mendelssohn, Pachelbel, Berger, Schaefer, Nelhybel and Dvorak will be performed by the whole choir which also incorporates two smaller groups, the Collegium Musicum and its consort of viols and the University of Guelph Vocal Octet. Both of these groups will participate in the program.

The performance on Saturday is a reciprocal visit from Guelph University who hosted the Queen's Choral Ensemble at Guelph just recently. The University of Guelph Choir plan to tour Austria and Germany in August of this year and will sing concerts in 10 cities. As well, they will form the core choir, along with the Ontario Youth Choir for performances of Handel's Israel in Egypt, under David Willcocks, for the Chorus-in-Contact concert at the 1977 Guelph Spring Festival.

Bitter Grounds

Hooray! for Watson and Reynolds

by Bernie Helling

On Saturday I snuck into Clark Hall's Bitter Grounds with a wretched camera, press pass and a couple of rolls of film. I couldn't have gone only to take pictures - I'm a lousy photographer - I went to listen to Watson and Reynolds, (although Bowen has tied the act up), whom I had seen on a late night TVO concert after "The Prisoner".

So I sat down, drank myself silly, played with my camera, disturbed the patrons by wandering around, filled my lungs with smoke and listened to some damn good music! Hooray for the "minstrels of mirth, mirth" as they call themselves. Hooray for the instrumentals, especially Watson's pregnant fiddle! Hooray for the vocals, all three of them can meld their voices in such a way as to pass off raw emotion as music. Hooray for the heavy folk songs, the Zimmerman's and the Carol King numbers (especially "Wish I had a River"), Hooray for "Renaissance Blues" with its pyramid power-chorus of the gods overtones. Hooray for their lighter stuff, like the "Ballad of the Suicidal Cochrach," "Hippie for a Day" and "If you see Kay..."

Too many Hoorays??? Ask the audience; they were glued to the stage. Anything wrong? Well - the warm-up singer, the bad amps, the overdone Olympic dope-smoking routine - sure as all hell I wish I knew what they were off doing during intermission.

I left early to develop the film and didn't hear "Renaissance Man". I really didn't know how D.J. Brown would fit in with Watson and Reynolds - well, he fit in fine - he holds the group together. I wish Watson would do a bit more: "Old Cow Hand" was really well done.

I hope they come back, hope I get a better camera, colder beer and a better seat. Watch these brave souls, they'll go far.

Coming this weekend to the Grounds (March 18 and 19) will be the Dixie Flyers. The Flyer's home base is London, Ont., but three of its members come from Toronto. Bob Baumbach, leader and guitarist, is "the best bluegrass player in Canada," according to the others, but the entire group is composed of excellent musicians. Each one carefully studied other musicians in his file and adapted different techniques to create an original style. The band's music is 90 percent bluegrass and 10 percent newgrass, with its American jazz and blues background. The Dixie Flyers is the only group in Ontario which plays traditional bluegrass. As a result, other artists such as Willie P. Bennett occasionally work with them.

The Flyers have travelled throughout the States and Canada and have attended various folk and bluegrass festivals. They enjoy being on the road because they meet a lot of great people, and they obviously love their music.

Concert at St. James ...

"The Chamber Singers have developed a very fine instrument. . . all it wants is use"

by Eric Hughes

St. James Church is a delightful place to hold a concert. It is acoustically sound (no pun intended) and intimate enough to provide a pleasing showcase for a group the size of the Queen's Chamber Singers. Their twenty-six voices had no trouble filling the building with a wonderfully balanced and tonally near-perfect sound at last Friday evening's concert. However, just as at St. James there is little soaring, unabashedly devoted religious feel, the Chamber Singers were unwilling to step beyond the confines of technicality in their performance. They did not seem to be feeling with the music; rather they appeared to be manufacturing the affects of those feelings. So, though the sound was technically full, it was emotionally hollow.

This was abetted in no small way by their choice of a relatively unvaried program. The opening "Two Canticles" by Clifford Crawley of the music department is a very clean and pleasant setting. The choir was at its best here, performing with just the required graceful athleticism - all in all, an effective beginning. Following without break was Lennox Berkeley's setting of the twenty-third psalm through which organ accompaniment weaves very much as might a flock of sheep. Soprano Lorie Easton lent a gently expressive air to the solo work using to great advantage the wonderful reed-like quality of her voice. The final piece in this opening set was Healey Willan's exquisite motet, "I beheld her, beautiful as a dove." The lyricism of the piece did not escape the choir, but its intricate movement of voices was lost due to the weakness (in this piece only, by the way) of tenors and contraltos.

The pastoral qualities of these first three works made their uninterrupted performance perfectly logical. It also set up very nicely what turned out to be the evening's only departure from this lyrical type of music, F.R.C. Clarke's "Psalm 144 I will extol Thee." Unfortunately the opportunity to change the pace set by the previous pieces was not used. Clarke's music here is bombastic and segmented. With the use of brass and percussion, a very ceremonial tone is set, broken by some contrasting rhythms and harmonic interplay. The choir was simply not up to the exalted feelings suggested by the music and this piece was the most disappointing of the evening. The odd tension between the instrumental and choral parts of the work was never close to being resolved, due partly to the detachment of the choir, and partly to the very unsure footing of the instrumentalists.

Eleanor Daley's organ interlude - Massieu's "Apparition de l'Eglise Eternelle" provided an interesting, well-executed and appropriate introduction to the major work of the evening, Franz Liszt's "Missa Choralis".

Liszt's feelings about his God we know to have been very deep. However, they seem to have lacked a great deal of passion, at least his mass gave no evidence of any. It is not even sublimely detached - something which can often trigger the most moving musical expression. Rather, he seems deeply entrenched in the manipulation of the music itself, relying very much on full choir with little variety of mood or tone.

The Chamber Singers gave it a good go. Their intonation was impeccable (with the surprising exception of most of the solo work and a few bass entrances) and they were musically confident. However, their clamours were premature, and in many cases trailed off instead of ending at their logical conclusions. There was very little building in this work, top, middle and bottom being plateaus to hit and on which to rest. There was, however, little movement between these points.

Where the concert was pleasant, it was not exhilarating. The Chamber Singers have developed a very fine instrument. All it wants is use.

Carlos Santana . . .

. . . one of the most exciting bands in rock

by Paul Reynolds

In music as imitative as rock, few guitarists are true originals: the type of musician who shows a unique and recognizable sound from the first he plays in a performance. Last Thursday night's concert at Jock Harty showcased such an artist when the first guitar solo came up the familiar screaming sound, fluid runs of notes and darting hands could belong to no-one but Carlos Santana. Like a Jimi Hendrix or a Jerry Garcia, this man's virtuosity can hold any audience enthralled and begging for more, even when he isn't playing at the peak of his ability, as on Thursday night.

That's not to say that Santana didn't stage an enjoyable and thoroughly professional concert at Queen's; they did. It's just that any desire by the musicians to get as much out of the event as the audience seemed notably absent, particularly on the guitarist's part. Carlos seemed unusually uninspired at many points. When you've heard him light into "Incident at Neshabur" on previous occasions and play some stunning solos, the disjointed noodling he chose to play during that song Thursday (even stopping mid-solo to casually tune a string at one point) was a little disappointing. Still, even when uncommitted to a degree, this man plays extraordinary guitar; and with his intermittent moments of inspired playing and the typically excellent Santana band, ninety minutes of mostly satisfying music was provided.

"Let the Children Play" from their new album Festival was a powerful opener and early assurance that this new edition of the band is as tight and accomplished as we've come to expect. All the Santana trademarks were there; the perfect harmonies, meaty Latin rhythms and tight interplay between the guitarist and his percussionists. Carlos has a reputation for assembling muscular rhythm sections and this one is possibly his best yet. Returning founding member Jose Chepito Areas was the star percussionist, often stealing his leader's spotlight with his rattling cross-rhythms on timbales and his fine dual conga work next to Raul Rekow. Drummer Pablo Tellez bears a close physical resemblance to Santana's original drummer, the amazing Mike Shrieve. Musically too, he gave hints of Shrieve's power with his driving double bass drum work and economic solo during "Soul Sacrifice".

Despite their strength, Santana's sidemen rarely upstaged their leader's guitar as the star of the show. Live at least, the Santana band is a 'wall of sound' for Carlos to hang his flurries of improvisations on. In this show he reached his soloing peaks in beautiful instrumentals like "Europa" and "Samba Pa Ti". The latter, to me, has always been the ideal vehicle for Santana's guitar, building from a tastefully stated theme through a tempo change to layer upon layer of emotionally charged guitar runs. The song has progressed with him over the years and still has all the energy of the original, but with a freer, jazzy touch. The long, feedback sustained notes were exhilarating as ever, and his ability to change the note precisely by small movements of his guitar is always amazing to watch.

Material-wise, the band played it safe, performing most of the old favourites fans still expect to hear. Santana himself must have performed these songs countless times, and occasionally the boredom he must feel in churning them out again showed. "Black Magic Woman", once one of his solo showcases, was remarkable for its lack of guitar work. Carlos hardly soloed at all. "Incident at Neshabur" was similarly restrained. Midway through "Oye Come Va", though, things seemed to light up and with a fine guitar solo and Chipito Areas' "crazed Spanish phrases, it was one of the evening's highlights. Another was "Soul Sacrifice", the first encore, showing some of Carlos' best work and an opportunity for some individual solos by the percussionists.

In a band so carefully chosen, the presence of keyboards player Tom Coster and singer Greg Walker puzzled me. Coster is an uninventive and repetitive soloist, playing unemphatic strings of notes, and his mellotron and synthesizer were clumsy and obtrusive. He had a few worthwhile moments on organ and in his jazzy electric piano licks on "Oye Come Va", but for the most part he was an unwelcome addition to the sound. Greg Walker also seemed an inappropriate choice as singer. His singing is too smooth and Philly-soul styled to gel with the band's fiery Latin rhythms, and when he left for much of the second half, I hardly missed him.

Several 'soul' styled numbers in the middle of the set served as a lame indication of where Carlos Santana is heading. One of them "Transcending", moved me to nothing more mystical than boredom. To hear a man who was so adventurous and uncompromising about his guitar playing in the early '70s play repetitive rhythm in a disco format song like "What you need is what you want", is a little depressing. Thankfully, he had enough sheer ability, and his band so much spirit, that complaints like these could be overshadowed by unforgettable moments like the superb, stuttering solo in "Dance, Sister, Dance" with Chipito Areas in perfect synchrony with Carlos' emphasis. They may be cruising artistically, but Thursday night showed an evening ride with Carlos Santana and his band is still one of the most exciting in rock.

An activist press

On University Journalism

We consider an active democratic style of press to be of crucial importance for a university newspaper. The institutional nature of the university and of student journalism requires that a newspaper provide a medium for the development of journalistic skills while meeting the needs and involvement of all sectors of the campus community with news coverage, information exchange, and critical dialogue in a fashion which is consciously active and democratic.

We would strive to develop the Journal in this active role by fulfilling and extending the basic function of news coverage and by providing a locus to initiate and facilitate expression, debate and involvement within a consistent orientation of solid critical and relevant journalism.

On Objectivity

We have encountered a lot of criticism to the effect that our approach is lacking in "objectivity". However, in our minds, objectivity is not possible, or even in some senses of the word, desirable. Fairness and accuracy are necessary in news reporting, but invariably the stories selected for coverage, the aspects of those stories which are stressed, the relative importance given the various points, and the prominence given the story cannot be objective in any absolute sense. The nature of the role and operation of the press requires that such decisions be made at every moment.

The honest recognition of these facts, and the explicit elaboration of the positions adopted for reporting will ensure less real "bias" than impossible claims to objectivity.

What is important is democracy in the press. An active Journal would encourage debate from all perspectives on problems and their possible solutions. Unless one is willing to argue that no change is desirable and therefore objective, who could argue with such a role.

On Organization

In this context, we would support an organization as decentralized as possible both in terms of independent responsibility for all the various aspects of the paper, and by encouraging the development of a wide base skills amongst all the staff. As the coordinating functionaries responsible for an efficient and comprehensive newspaper product, we would strive to develop the organizational arena and the atmosphere which allows for a maximum of democratic input and which promotes a mutual learning process that realizes the quality of the personnel and the paper. We value, and personally operate best in situations of openness and critical discussion, and our efforts in the Journal organization would reflect this approach.

A Few Specifics

The basic decisions of the Journal would as much as possible be made with the involvement of all the staff. In the area of editorial policy for example, if wide differences of opinion became evident, we would support a dual editorial policy. This is in keeping with our view that the Journal is an open forum of debate.

Investigative reporting is an area we would strongly encourage. Similarly we support expanded news coverage which would include stories from other universities. We do not see the desirability of dictating a single reporting style (e.g. pyramid), and would accept a variety of styles of journalism which satisfy the requirements of coherence and accuracy. We would like to see greater use of the freestyle and features sections, and recognize the importance of the reviews and sports sections. One innovation we would promote is occasionally expanding issues to allow a structured discussion on a particular theme which is of current wide-spread interest. This might have been done this year on topics such as sexuality, the methodology and legitimacy of protest, God and religion, and Quebec separatism.

On Staff

We hope that as many of the present staff as wish to will continue to work with the Journal. This is necessary to provide a base of experience for diversity. The Journal should not represent just one section of the campus community, or one homogeneous view of things. This is what is meant by an open newspaper. We would not censor a or otherwise alter reporting (except of course for accuracy and clarity), and would try to achieve a good divergence of style and content, and so attract a variety of writing, photography, artwork, etc.

On Ourselves

We feel we have the time and energy to develop the skills necessary to run the Journal and the ability to provide the organization and atmosphere in which people can operate efficiently and devotively. Our experience with the Journal and other publishing operations, though not as comprehensive as we would like, gives us the recognition of the time and degree of difficulty this job entails. We feel we do have something to offer in further promoting an active democratic paper.

Byrne and Scott:

Consolidate Journal success

We see the Journal's duty to comprehensively represent student affairs, events, and opinions as being two-fold. As a reporter of news, it has a moral and an ethical obligation to present facts objectively, impartially recounting news without imparting political or moral bias. As a forum for student views it must be prepared to offer reasoned, considered opinion in the mature and clearminded manner which has always been a hallmark of this University.

Over the past year, the Queen's Journal has expanded its size and scope far beyond expectations usual for a student newspaper. This expansion has brought with it an accumulation of expertise which is nothing less than professional in nature.

We intend to carry on the editorial policies instituted this year, consolidating and reinforcing the progress the Journal has made to date. In addition, the Journal next year, will continue to plumb the Campus for new views and new voices in its effort to reflect the interests and opinions of its readers. We intend that the success of the Journal this year will be sustained, yet strengthened next year.

The Journal is not a passive instrument. The word 'passive' is almost perjorative in its connotation. Lassitude is not, and will not be characteristic of the Journal's response. Not 'passive', but rather 'responsive', the power of the paper's voice lies in the degree of discretion with which it is used.

Any policy changes concerning professional and organizational affiliations will rest with both the Journal staff and its Editorial Board. We view the ideals of a national student news service as extremely worthwhile. As founding members of CUP, the Journal is obligated to take a more definitive stand than that of "members under protest". Either we are 'in' and working for change, or entirely 'out'. A decision one way or the other rests on the outcome of next week's conference in Ottawa, and ultimately with the staff as a whole.

Next year, we wish to see the section editors directly involved in the writing of editorials, based on their interests and fields of endeavour. This reflects our view that the Journal is a creation of no one person, and consequently its opinion, while of necessity competent and considered, need not reflect the thoughts of only one or two of its staff.

The Journal has, in the past, relied heavily upon CUP Features, which, while well-written and of interest, often intimidated Queen's writers of equal, if not greater talents. We wish to see more feature-length articles coming from the Queen's community. The paper has access to resources and personnel and both should be used to better advantage.

In a similar manner, we hope that the Journal will avail itself more fully next year, of the many gifted graphic artists at Queen's. A graphic (or photograph), is often that line extension which completes a story. Because graphics must be tailored to meet the needs of individual stories, it is often 'stretching a point' to try to adapt CUP Graphics to our stories. Establishing a team of on-staff graphic artists will add both depth and continuity to the Journal's visual presentation.

Gals outski weather 'n Mustangs

Queen's women's Alpine ski team finished the season in fine style with a second place finish in the OWIAA championships held at Mont Cascades.

Lead by Jane McGillvray, and strongly supported by team members Robin McLeod, Jill Fuller, Stephanie Currie, Mary Chaput and Wendy Bethune, Queen's managed to fight the elements and Western University for a strong second place finish.

On Saturday morning, the slalom event, with its 50 odd gates to memorize, was held. The course was challenging even for the best skiers, but Queen's managed to place 3 girls in the top ten for a second place

Hockey Gals need assist

by Susan Creighton

The ice hockey Gals, O.W.I.A.A. champions, are seeking further challenges as they travel to Halifax, Nova Scotia this coming weekend for an invitational hockey tournament. Dalhousie University is holding the eight team tournament with such teams as U.P.E.I., U.N.B., and other teams from the Halifax area in attendance. The games will be played over the 18th and 19th and it should be noted that it was on these same days a month ago that the Gals brought the championship home.

Unfortunately for the team members, Queen's has no money to offer for post-season games. In other words, players must dig into their pockets to cover travelling and accommodation expenses. As any student knows, this is no inexpensive venture and pockets are empty enough as it is nowadays (what with the price of coffee!) To help cover these costs, the Gals are holding a raffle which will carry over after the tournament until April fourth. With thanks to Cupolo's, the Gals are offering a choice of: 1) a CCM Targa 10-speed bike; 2) an H-frame backpack with a down-filled sleeping bag; 3) a T-2000 tennis racquet with a Head tennis bag and Trelorn tennis balls. The winner of the draw will have the choice of one of these three sports packages, each worth $130. Tickets are 50c each or 3 for $1.00, and are being sold all over campus by members of the team and other kind friends. The draw will take place on April 4th at 7pm in the Phys-Ed center lobby.

The Gals really require your assistance for this trip. There are no national finals in women's hockey, so this will have to do. Don't forget that they are the Ontario Hockey champions!

The girls knew they had to ski their best on Sunday if they were going to hold their lead over the University of Western Ontario. After all, Andrea Esson, ex-national team member who missed the slalom, would be raring in the Giant Slalom on Sunday and she would be hard to beat.

When Sunday arrived, it was raining and misty at the hill. However, the Queen's fans lead by Peter Kopp on microphone (he was the starter), Ed Deans, Dave Beauchamp, Tim Wardrop and all our other faithful gatekeepers, helped raise the morale of the girls. They burst out of the starting gate and skied their hearts out. All 6 girls managed to complete both runs and when the final results came in, we were second in the team standing. A fine finish to the season and one to be proud of!

RESULTS: GIANT SLALOM - 1. Andrea Esson, Toronto, 7. Jane McGillvray, Queen's, 9. Jill Fuller, Queen's, 10. Robin McLeod, Queen's, 12. Stephanie Currie, Queen's, 18. Mary Chaput, Queen's, 24. Wendy Bethune, Queen's.

Gals Nordic fourth in final

by Carolyn Broadhurst

The Queen's Women's Nordic ski team finished off their season with the OWIAA championships, held at Midland during the weekend prior to the University Mid-term break. Out of the university teams represented, the Queen's Gals placed fourth behind Guelph (first place) and Carleton (third place). Although the Gals did not place in the top three, they were still happy with the results because they all started the season as inexperienced racers.

On Friday, the relay team of Carolyn Broadhurst, Barb Jarosz and Amy Marieness completed a 2.5 x 3 kilometer relay and ended in a slightly disappointing sixth place finish out of the nine teams competing. On Saturday, the Gals skied in a 5 kilometer individual race. In order to determine the winning team, the best 3 finishing times were added together.

Out of approximately 39 racers, the ninth place finish of Barb Jarosz, the 11th place finish of Carolyn Broadhurst and the 19th place finish of Amy Marieness, put the Gals in 4th spot for this event. Skiers Jane Hunt and Eva Scholz also provided "depth" to the team during this event. Special congratulations should be given to Barb Jarosz who placed 1st and Carolyn Broadhurst who placed 3rd.

However, now as the last bit of snow reluctantly leaves Kingston's unplowed streets and sidewalks, the Gals along with other ski enthusiasts are putting away their skis for the summer. The Gals would like to sincerely thank Mr. Jake Edwards for his coaching efforts all season and for taking us to the numerous meets we attended.

W-Polo Gals end "season?"

Last weekend the Women's Intercollegiate Waterpolo team finished the season off in Hamilton. They made the arduous journey in a van marked "Chris's Harem" to play three games against Hamilton "A", the Ontario champs, and "B" (the other two teams didn't show up, could it be that they were afraid of us?)

Although the team was outscored by the Piranaha, and managed only to score 1 goal, the team, Debbie Watson, Jill Cooper, Kathy Blanchard, Jessica Gordan and Janet Schwartz (defence), Francine Vickery, Karen Fyson, Heidi Kerz and Leslie Scott, (Forwards), and of course our goalie Heather Gifford (sometimes Janet Schwartz too) succeeded in keeping the scoring down to a minimum (in both directions).

The team had a very short season playing in only three tournaments during the year, one in November against Ottawa, the OWIWA Championships at Queens February 19-20, and last weekend in Hamilton. Although they were not very successful scorewise, the team had great spirit and has improved immensely since September, thanks to coach Chris Whately. Wait till next year!

Skydiving is not for everyone

Try it, maybe you'll like it

by Frank Pagnucco

Skydiving is a sport which has gained in popularity recently. For the last several years the opportunity to skydive has been open to students and the general public through the Queen's Skydiving Club. The club is run by an annually elected board of directors. A member of this year's board is Demetri Georgiou.

Becoming a skydiver seems to be a relatively simple and inexpensive thing to do at Queen's University. The membership fee of sixty-five dollars gives a person access to the necessary equipment, skydiving instruction and the opportunity to make a first jump. The club's instructors give new skydivers a four hour morning class that will, according to Mr. Georgiou, "teach you everything you've ever wanted to know about a first jump."

In this class skydivers are taught how to jump out of an airplane, how to land properly and how to react in emergency situations. After this lesson the rookies are flown up to 3,000 feet where the decision of whether or not to jump is left up to them.

The sanity of those who enjoy parachuting has often been questioned by those who prefer to maintain a more intimate contact with Mother Earth. The thrill of skydiving lures many people. Many come hoping to experience the "delicious terror" of free fall. Others come to skydive to be able to say that they've done it. Andy Kemp, who began jumping this year, says that the "seconds leading up to the jump" are the most psychologically devastating for a new jumper.

Many skydivers who make their first jumps never return to participate in the sport again. At Queen's University eight people still jump regularly of the forty that made first jumps back in September. This figure upholds Mr. Georgiou's claim that "skydiving is not a sport for everyone." As in other sports, women are well represented in skydiving. At Queen's Cathy McGowan is one of five women who are members of the Skydiving Club.

The sport of skydiving, as most other sports do, builds on basics to become more diverse and more exciting. Some skydivers perform somersaults and turns in sequence in an effort to achieve an element of acrobatic perfection. Others dive for accuracy hoping to hit bullseyes on land-based targets. Still others participate in "relative work" where any number of individuals jump at more or less the same time and while in freefall link hands to form human circles and even three dimensional formations. Throughout the world competitions are held for skydivers performing these tasks. The Queen's Skydiving Club is affiliated with the Canadian Sport Parachuting Association, the governing body of most parachute clubs in Canada, and the Canadian Collegiate Sport Parachute League. These organizations are involved in international skydiving competitions.

The arrival of spring will see Queen's skydivers returning to their exciting pastime. Those seeking a refreshing break from studies should consider skydiving. The Queen's Skydiving Club plans on holding another training session for the reading week before the final exams in April.

Queen's place 3 All Canadians at University Championships

This past weekend five swimmers and divers represented Queen's in the Canadian University Swimming and Diving Championships in Toronto. The meet was held on March 4th, 5th and 6th at the Etobicoke Olympium.

Janet Nutter and Eve Wahn represented Queen's in the 1 metre and 3 metres diving competitions. Janet placed first in the 3 metre competition with a score of 396, 3 points under the CWIAU record. She also placed first in the 1 metre competition with a score of 351. Eve placed 13th in the 1 metre competition out of 21 competitors.

Tim Dennis, Greg Vanular and Diana Harrison represented Queen's in the swimming events. Tim competed in the 400 individual medley placing sixth with a time of 4:24.4, a new Queen's record. He also competed in the 200 individual medley and the 200 breast stroke. He swam a personal best in the 200 breaststroke of 2:16.4. Tim placed 9th in the 200 IM with a time of 2:00, another Queen's record. Greg Vanular placed 8th in both the 200 backstroke and the 100 butterfly. He broke the Queen's record in the 100 butterfly with a time of 54.09. Greg also competed in the 100 backstroke and placed 3rd with a time of 54.3, another Queen's record. Diana Harrison, in her first year swimming for Queen's, competed in the 100, 200 and 50 freestyle. She placed 12th in the 50 freestyle with a new Queen's record of 26:25. Diana set another Queen's record in the 100 freestyle with a time of 58.7.

There were 20 women's teams and 18 men's teams competing in the meet. Queen's women and men placed 12th overall. The Ontario women and men won the conference title.

Janet Nutter, Tim Dennis and Greg Vanular due to their performance were voted "All Canadian".

Congratulations to all of the swimmers.

"Turk" washed up?

by Michael Fitzgibbon

Here is a small quiz for all you hockey addicts: Name the 30-year-old, third string center for the Vancouver Canucks who has bridged the North American continent, is known to get hot under the collar easily, and is considered to be one of hockey's most eligible bachelors.

If you guessed Derek Sanderson, you are right on target. The Niagara Falls native has had, what many would call, one of hockey's most illustrious careers. It all began in his home town where he dropped out of high school to join the local team. Today Sanderson is contributing to Vancouver's feeble attack, but is bordering on the edge of obscurity.

Most fans first took notice of this hardened, mustachioed center when he skated into the Boston Bruins lineup in 1964. His stick handling ability won the hearts of the fans and the NHL. He was awarded the leagues' Rookie of the Year laurel for his determined style of play.

In Boston, "Turk" Sanderson established himself as a first-class penalty killer, an inspired and fearless scrapper, and a local favorite amongst the Beantown hockey cult. The Turk had everything going for him; he was playing on a winning, aspiring club, was proprietor of a bar in Boston which netted him $30,000 a year, and had a harem of lovely, young ladies.

"Dirty Derek" was primarily known for his on-the-ice antics and his controversial attitude towards the game. He was hated by the other teams and their fans. Rubber chickens and obscene signs dotted the hostile crowds. The fans wanted to provoke Dirty Derek, and often times they succeeded. Sanderson led many a Bruin's rush into the stands to subdue the culprits. With the Bruins, Sanderson collected more penalty minutes than McDonald's has sold hamburgers.

In 1972, the World Hockey Association decided to embark upon Sanderson's popularity. Johnny McKenzie, a former teammate of Derek's, and his Philadelphia Blazers waved a $2.6 million price tag in front of the Turk's astounded eyes. He grabbed the bait, and became the world's highest paid athlete at the nimble age of 26.

The love affair ended as quickly as it started. On November 1, 1972, Derek Sanderson played in his last WHA contest. He suffered a herniated disc after skating over a piece of paper (someone later suggested that it was a $100 bill which had fallen out of Derek's wallet). Turk Sanderson was tired of the WHA's mediocrity and longed to return to the Bruins

His jump back to the Boston club was an unpleasant one. The players and fans were turned off at his thirst for money and his betrayal of the team.

From Boston, Sanderson's hockey career resembles an American Airlines flight schedule. He was traded to the New York Rangers where he was used sparingly. In 1975, the Rangers shipped the controversial center out west to St. Louis where he was joined by his former Ranger coach, Emile Francis. The Turk showed signs of his old style and collected a career high of 67 points.

This season Derek Sanderson got off to a poor start. He was unable to find his scoring touch, and lost his spot as one of the Blues three regular centers. After 40 games he managed to score only eight goals. On January 11, Sanderson was demoted to the Kansas City Blues of the Central Hockey League. Francis had placed the center on waivers, but the 17 other NHL teams turned up their noses at the offer.

The Turk waved good-bye to the Blues organization in early February. The Canucks acquired him in attempt to arouse the sagging club. Hockey observers in Vancouver report that the Turk is no longer the same, aggressive player "Can't cut it" and

The WIC News

Saccharin ban

Saccharin is being banned for use in foods, and as a sweetener in drug preparations as studies on rats indicate it may cause cancer. Diabetics and others who must restrict their carbohydrate diet will still be able to buy pure saccharin. After September 1, its sale will be limited to drug stores.

Diet soft drinks will have to discontinue saccharin use on July 1. The sale of all other foods containing the drug will not be allowed after November 1 and drugs containing saccharin as a non-medical ingredient will not be allowed after December 31, 1978.

Hope for diabetics

Canadian researchers in Toronto have developed a tiny chamber which may be implanted as a substitute pancreas for diabetics, releasing insulin into the bloodstream like a normal pancreas. At present diabetics take insulin shots once or twice a day to control the level of glucose in their blood. But this cannot match the continued release of insulin from the pancreas which more finely maintains the correct blood sugar concentration.

The cylindrical chamber contains pancreas tissue, the islets of Langerhans, kept alive in a nutrient solution. There are hollow fibres running through the centre of the chamber. These fibres are connected with the diabetic's circulation. The fibres contain tiny pores, so that glucose can diffuse from the blood into the islet cell culture and insulin made by the cells can flow out. As the blood flows through the chamber the islet cells can monitor the level of glucose in it and synthesize insulin as it is needed.

The insulin chamber has been tested on diabetic monkeys and has been successful in maintaining normal blood sugar levels. The researchers now plan to test it on a human volunteer - a diabetic who is also undergoing treatment on a kidney dialysis machine. Dialysis patients already have tubes inserted into an artery and a vein to allow blood to be shunted to the dialysis machine for cleaning. This would make it easier to attach the insulin chamber for testing.

Insulin was discovered in 1922 and has saved the lives of many diabetics since then. But there have been problems with the insulin shots normally given - complications include blindness and kidney and heart failure. It is thought that other products secreted by the pancreas besides insulin are vitally needed in the blood. By using the whole islets in the insulin chamber, and not just insulin-producing cells, the whole range of pancreatic compounds can be released into the circulation as necessary and the complications avoided.

Hostage drama

134 people were held as hostages by members of the Hanafi Moslem religious sect in three Washington buildings. The drama came to an end Friday, as all hostages were released but only eleven people were injured and one person, a staff reporter for WHUR, was killed. The twelve men involved have all been released on bail or, on their own recognizance under terms of a deal worked out for the release of the 134 hostages. All twelve were charged with armed kidnapping, and prosecutors said felony murder indictments would be sought against them.

The leader of the terrorists, Hamaas Abdul Khalis, demanded the cancellation of a movie about the Islamic prophet Mohammed, and demanded that the men convicted of the 1973 slayings of seven Hanafi Moslems be brought to one of the buildings.

The release came after intense negotiations with Suhabzada Yaqub Khan, ambassador of Pakistan, Egyptian Ambassador Ashraf Ghorbal, and Iranian Ambassador Ardeshir Zahedi. The ambassadors went virtually sleepless for 48 hours. They finally persuaded the Hanafi leader to meet them on Thursday night.

After three hours of talks about the teachings of Islam that espouse compassion and mercy, the three ambassadors came away with the belief that the hostages would soon be released. They were released three hours later after a final phone call between Khalis and the Washington police chief.

Low dollar

The Canadian dollar closed at its lowest level in seven years on Wednesday, dropping to 94.86 cents (US). The decline is caused by commercial selling of Canadian dollars, with a lack of buyers. This is because individuals and companies that would normally participate in the market are uncertain about where the dollar is headed.

Some market analysts predict the dollar may fall to 90 or 92 cents by the end of 1977.

Unemployed youth

The International Labour Organization reported a record 7 million unemployed young people in the world's 24 richest countries. The report called the situation the industrialized world's gravest problem.

The report blamed the reluctance of employers to hire those without experience, and an inadequate educational system. The study noted that more and more young people fail to meet the standards required for training in modern industry and feel they faced a stacked deck.

The study reported a common pattern in all countries of the industrialized West where people under 25 years, 22 percent of the total population, make up 40 percent of the total unemployment.

Centre in danger

Two Queen's students, Peter Martin and Kirk Patterson, have handed in a report to the city planning board warning that the downtown centre is in danger of collapse for lack of revitalization.

Recommendations include development of unused waterfront land, construction of multi-storey parking buildings and creation of a pedestrian mall during the summer on Market Square and lower Princess and Brock Streets.

The authors urge the city not to approve virtually every proposal entrepreneurs submit for the downtown area (as it has in the past) but to plan a large, multi-use development which will encourage population flow towards the heart of the city. To this purpose the creation of new, large shopping centres on the outskirts should be discouraged.

Homosexuals talk

Four homosexuals were invited to talk to two health classes last week at Loyalist Collegiate and Vocational Institute in Kingston. Some parents appeared more uptight over the visit than did the students.

Among some parents and trustees there was the feeling that such speakers should not be allowed in the schools. Fears centred around possible "recruitment" of the students by homosexual groups. The students themselves felt that the discussion was open, frank and informative.

Plea for centre

The Chamber of Commerce is worried about the downtown area and would like to see development here rather than on building a new shopping centre. They are against the proposed commercial development near Highway 401 and Division St., but feel that a shopping centre in Kingstown Township would be less detrimental to the city core.

They warn of impending fragmentation of the community if the city centre is not encouraged to expand.

Odds and ends

When a driver of a hearse had a high-way accident in Spain the ambulance drivers put the corpse in the ambulance and the unconscious driver in the coffin. Upon closer inspection, the mistake was noticed.

A boy was born in Sheffield England with four legs. Operated on last week, he will be able to live a normal life. He is one of only twelve similar recorded cases.

Cockroaches have been proved even more clever than was formerly believed possible. Experimenters at Michigan State University have discovered that cockroaches learn faster after their heads have been chopped off.

Beheaded cockroaches can live up to a week because they have nerve clusters in other areas of their bodies.

A Russian man has successfully trained a group of headed cockroaches to open tiny newspapers, to sit on wee chairs and to eat off miniature plates on a cockroach-size table.

Journal quits CUP as of April 30

by Deb Sigler
The Queen's Journal staff voted to withdraw from the Canadian University Press (CUP) following a conference in Ottawa at which a budget increase of 70 percent for CUP was approved and a Journal proposal to redraft the CUP Statement of Purposes for the News Service was defeated.
At a Journal meeting last Wednesday night, the staff voted 17-2 to drop out of the 72 member syndicate which it founded with the U of T Varsity and the McGill Daily in 1937. The Journal paid $3,756 this year for membership in CUP, fees would rise to approximately $6,500 for 1977-78.
The expansion plans called for four regional bureaux to be created next year at a cost of roughly $10,000 each and for increased use of the Telex system.

Engineers' "bar rally" ends with five arrests

Glen Farley
Four Queen's students were arrested recently in Watertown, N.Y. while participating in what is becoming an annual event - a bar rally. They were apprehended for urinating on public sidewalks. A fifth man, James Inksater of Paris, Ontario, was arrested for shouting obscenities at police from a window of one of the two buses rented for the occasion.

A story in the Watertown Daily News quoted a local policeman as saying that "the Canadians complained that they are allowed to do that on their campus." The four charged were Colin Barclay and Allan Kangas, both first year engineers, David Leask, a Geology student and Robert W. Campbell, a second year engineer.

Steve Chapman, President of the Engineering Society, expressed disapproval of the "embarrassing" events in Watertown, adding that bar rallies can and have been organized without a hitch. Chapman also said that the Engineering Society was in no way responsible for organizing the recent one.

AMS President Hugh Christie has written a letter of apology to the mayor of Watertown in which he said he hoped that the citizens of Watertown did not consider the actions of this small group typical of the way Queen's students in general conduct themselves.

The students were released as a result of intervention by personal friends.

The AMS Court may consider the actions of this small group typical of the way Queen's students in general conduct themselves.

The students were released as a result of intervention by personal friends.

The AMS Court may consider further prosecution of the offenders Mike Yearsely Chief Justice, told the Journal, "if the offenders are not brought to account by the student community, it suggests that the student community doesn't care."

During the last expedition to Watertown on February, 1975, five students were arrested on charges of police harassment and public intoxication.

Re-elections: no changes

One year ASUS Reps to AMS (7 elected)
Ross Bartlett (519), Deb Meredith (420), Brenda Findlay (370), Rod Hinton (350), Ian McNeil (325), Kathy Vernon (276), Geoff Underhill (273), Diane Olchowski (261), Jane Whitey (235), John Welch (226).
Two Year ASUS reps to AMS (2 elected)
Kim Fennel (415), Eric Evans (323), Dan Brisbane (267).
Two Year ASUS Senator (1 elected)
Gord Howe (358), Fred Balfour (230), John Say (76), Bernie Helling (48).
The referendum votes went as follows: 1,594 voted for increasing the Bus-it fee, 644 voted no 972 voted for disagreement with differential fees, 1,277 voted no. Queen's students agree with the differential fee for foreign students policy, 1,971 voted for maintaining the Legal Aid levy, of 75c, 225 voted no. 866 voted in favour of joining NUS, 1,341 voted no.

The only change in the election results, re-run by court order because of polling irregularities in February, was the replacement of Gerry Lewarne by Geoff Underhill as one-year ASUS rep to AMS. Lewarne withdrew his name.

Purposes for the News Service "the student press must perform both an educative and active function and critically support groups serving as agents of social change."

Concert hall out

by Paul Finkel

The Senate, acting on a recommendation from the Campus Planning Committee, has voted to remove from the books plans for the construction of a Concert Hall. This move was part of an effort by the Committee to re-evaluate planning proposals that have been established over the past decade.

A change in zoning bylaws has made the previously proposed site (bounded by King, Stuart, Lower Albert and St. Lawrence) unsuitable as a location. Hence the committee felt that this development coupled with the fact that the present site may not be the location desired, if a Concert Hall was constructed some time in the future, found it appropriate to "alter this apparent commitment." They noted that this move was "not intended to remove the idea of a concert hall from future development on the Queen's campus, but simply to clarify the planning situation." The proposed construction of a Concert Hall was the source of some controversy last year.

Health Sciences building

by Paul Finkel

Construction on the new Health Sciences building is proceeding according to schedule. Vice-Principal Kelly reported that barring any unforeseen developments the whole operation should be completed by the end of the 1978-9 academic year. He added that the funds received from the government for the project had exceeded previous expectations and also that further money was expected to be made available through the Wintario Corporation for clinical research and the replacement of obsolescent equipment.

Housing project on

Principal Watts announced that further work on the Queen's V housing project will continue "as soon as possible." He said a fall in the interest rate is needed to encourage construction at a cost not reflected by exorbitant rents to students.

New awards

The Senate has approved new memorial awards in Physics and Applied Science. The first, in memory of Christopher Petrie, who was killed in an automobile accident last summer, will go to the student in either the faculty of Arts and Science or Applied Science who shows the most promise of future achievement in experimental Physics. The Colin T. Bayne award, founded by the Class of Mechanical Engineering and friends, will be given to the graduating Mechanical Engineering Student showing the most proficiency in innovative design.

Theological Hoods

Also approved were two Academic Hoods for the M.A. of Theology and the M.A. of Theological Studies. The former will be purple with white trim, the latter black with purple trim.

ISABEL MACNEILL

Queen's University will bestow six honorary degrees at the Spring Convocation. The recipients will be G.E. Taylor, Dean of Theology, at the University of Winnipeg, G.I. Sawyer, a leading nuclear power engineer, Dean L.G. Macpherson, a dedicated Queen's administrator, Prof. E.A. Saddlemyer, a literary scholar and Isabel J. MacNeill, a humane penologist.

Dean Taylor will receive an honorary doctor of divinity degree. He has been Dean of Theology at the University of Winnipeg since 1968. The other five recipients will receive doctor of laws degrees.

Dr. Sawyer has been very involved in medical-legal matters in Ontario and is currently a member of the Joint Liaison Committee, Canadian Medical Association and Canadian Bar Association. He organized the Ontario Medical Foundation and has been editor of the Ontario Medical Review.

H.A. Smith, in 1955, was the Director of Nuclear Power Project at Chalk River, in charge of Hydro's nuclear development work and an 11 man team which developed the concept of the CANDU reactor. He is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada.

Queen's to honour six with degrees

Dean Macpherson was the first Dean of Queen's School of Business and the first Vice-Principal (Finance) at Queen's. He has been a Professor Emeritus since 1971.

Professor Saddlemyer is an eminent scholar in Anglo-Irish literature and drama. She is presently a professor at Victoria College, University of Toronto.

Isabel MacNeill was the first and only woman to direct a federal prison when she was the Superintendent of the Prison for Women, Kingston, 1960-66. She was awarded the Order of the British Empire in 1945 and is an Officer of the Order of Canada.

Rape Symposium discussed rapist, victim and the law

by Annette Nicholson

The impression made by a victim of rape on the police will determine whether or not the case is pursued, according to Debra Lewis, criminologist and co-founder of the Toronto Rape Crisis Centre. Lewis has undertaken a study of the cases reported to the police, specifically looking into the reasons why cases are investigated or dropped. She discovered that if the victim has been leading an independent life-style, as opposed to living at home in a sheltered situation, the case will likely not be looked into.

Lewis was speaking at the Rape Symposium Saturday March 26, which featured a film and some skits presented by the Theatre 5 group in the morning. A panel discussion dealt, in the most part, with procedure. Panel members, Sergeant Detective Michael Breen, Constable Linda Paul, Dr. Hugh Gorwill, Eva Horvath of the Ottawa Rape Crisis, and lawyer Mary Poile, recommended that a person who is attacked should go immediately to the police or to the hospital, without bathing or changing, and should not throw anything away. It was pointed out that the victim must decide at that time whether or not to ask the police to investigate, even though the victim is under considerable stress.

There were four workshops covering some aspects of rape: the rapist, the victim, the legal issues and the possibility of starting a rape crisis centre in Kingston.

"There seemed to be a feeling that one was needed here," said Anne Ferguson, who was chairperson for the afternoon events. The Community Information Service has submitted an application to the Canada Works Program for a grant to start such a centre. The CIS has not yet had a reply to its appeal.

Theatre 5 presented one skit portraying how men and women are socialized and another in which the victim of a robbery is placed in the position of defendant with a direct analogy to the plight of rape victims.

Corp. alters scholarship programme

$1000 GM award now for GM workers only

by Paul Finkle

General Motors has decided to impose alterations in its scholarship program for the 1977-8 academic year which no longer place the selection of recipients purely on the basis of academic criteria.

As a result, the Queen's Senate passed a motion last Thursday to have the Students Awards Office discontinue its selection of four students for the $1000 scholarships.

Dr. A. McGhie (Psychology) speaking to the motion on behalf of the committee on Scholarships and Student Aid, said the changes made by GM this year "were more than minor and concerned us a great deal."

He explained that the committee had voiced "strong objection" to the company's new award prerequisites and their desired process of selection.

GM had established that prospective scholarship recipients must have worked for them during the summer, with their job performance for that period being evaluated and incorporated into the final decision of whether or not they deserved an award.

The company also created a new method of selecting recipients requiring that the Queen's Student Awards Office "submit sixteen resumes to the Personnel Dept. of GM, along with its recommendations and a statement of the student's marks, from which GM would base their selection on academic marks, outside interests and career objectives."

Hitherto, GM had awarded the scholarships to four students selected by the Student Awards Office through assessment of their academic standing and recommendations from the Departments concerned.

Dr. McGhie added that the Assistant Registrar of the Student Awards Office Mrs. D. Laughton, had indicated to GM that her committee was not in favour of being cast in the role of a "recruitment" agency.

The motion adopted stated that the Student Awards Office would henceforth act merely as an agent, distributing the necessary forms to interested students.

The GM scholarships are awarded to students in their penultimate or final year in either Engineering, Business Administration, Commerce or Finance.

OSAP loans are extended

Harry C. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities announced that eligibility for grants under the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) would be extended in 1977-78 to Ontario residents taking full-time professional programs offered by CEGEPs in the Province of Quebec.

Quebec's CEGEPs, colleges d'enseignement general et professionnel, offer two distinct kinds of program: general and professional. The general programs are intended for Quebec students preparing for entrance into programs of study at Quebec universities; the professional programs are self-contained technical programs leading to completed diplomas and entrance into the work force.

Grant eligibility is extended only to those full-time students from Ontario taking the professional programs.

With the inclusion of CEGEP professional programs, OSAP loan and grant assistance will now be available to Ontario residents enrolled in eligible programs at all Canadian publicly supported post-secondary institutions.

OSAP provides loans and grants to Ontario post-secondary students who have insufficient money to pay their living expenses and tuition fees. The amount of assistance made available depends on the individual student's educational costs and financial resources.

In 1977-78, assistance up to $1,000 will be provided as a repayable loan guaranteed by the federal government under its Canada Student Loans Plan. Students needing additional assistance will normally receive it in the form of a provincial grant.

30 involved, residence doors kicked in -

Victoria Hall damaged in raid by students

Approximately thirty students raided Victoria Hall last Friday morning breaking windows and kicking in resident's doors. The front doors to the residence were also damaged in the incident.

AMS Court Chief Justice, Mike Yearsley, told the Queen's Journal that the incident apparently followed a Science 77 stag-smoker. Many of the participants will be facing charges at a hearing on April 6th in the AMS Court.

Yearsley said although Kingston City Police were at the scene, he didn't expect the Women's Residence Council (WRC) to "go to the extreme" of having charges laid against the offenders in Provincial Court.

Yearsley noted the trouble the AMS Court has in getting witnesses to come before the Court in such proceedings. The Chief Justice recalled a similar incident last year when a few students broke into Victoria Hall and one walked through the halls naked. Many girls he said, "don't see it as such a serious thing" and "don't want to point the finger" at the individuals involved. "On the one hand the girls are upset about this, but on the other hand they know these guys and don't really want to be bad sports," according to Yearsley. Other people, such as the President of the WRC, are duty bound to bring it to us."

Although in cases such as this many girls "get cold feet" or feel intimidated about coming before the Court to testify, many AMS Constables were at Victoria Hall and "they're much less faint hearted about naming names" Yearsley said.

Trustees give $50,000 to aid foreign students

by Paul Finkel

$50,000 has been made available by the Board of Trustees from special investment funds to aid foreign visa students adversely affected by the differential fees. A series of recommendations by the Senate Committee on Scholarships and Student Aid for the use of the money sparked a plethora of questions following its introduction as a motion and was finally referred by Senate back to the Committee for further investigation.

The recommendations had designated that $40,000 be allotted to visa students in graduate programs and $10,000 go to visa students in undergraduate programs "on the basis of deemed need." The students eligible for the awards would be those who had enrolled at Queen's subsequent to January 1977. The first awards from these funds would have been made in January of 1978.

Moe Chochla (Law '78) expressed objection to the 80-20 per cent split of funds between graduate and undergraduates, claiming that the awards should go to those students with the most need regardless of their programs.

Dr. A. McGhie (Psychology) speaking on behalf of the Committee said that the division between graduates and undergraduates had been "somewhat arbitrary", but noted that graduate students are often taken beyond their national borders when looking for good programs, adding that they are also paying for three terms of study while undergraduates pay only for two.

When asked by Dr. W.C. Higginson (Education) if the International Centre had been consulted for input during the drafting of the proposals, Dr. McGhie replied in the negative pointing out that the Committee had been "extremely rushed" in their efforts to establish a mechanism for usage of the funds.

Kaspar Pold (Director of the International Centre), commenting to the Journal about the proposals, criticized them for failing to do anything to aid those students who could not afford to attend an Ontario university due to the differentials, because the financial assistance would be available only to students who could already afford to register at Queen's in September. Yet he indicated he was satisfied that the motion was being referred back to the Committee and said that he had arranged a meeting with Dr. McGhie for this week.

Mr. Pold also berated the suggested division of the monies, citing the fact that foreign graduate students were eligible to apply to the Canadian government for financial aid while undergraduates "had no recourse to funds in Canada."

When reminded by the Journal of this latter situation, Dr. McGhie admitted that he and the Committee "hadn't realized that" when they met to draw up their recommendations.

The avenue for referral of the motion back to the Committee was opened when Principa Watts explained that the Committee had been asked to deal with the situation "in a very rushed manner" in order to have their proposals ready for presentation to the March meeting of Senate.

Yet Associate Dean McClay indicated to the Journal that Principa Watts had informed him that the $50,000 was made available by the Board of Trustees as early as the third week of February. Dr. McGhie said that he and his Committee had not been requested to draft proposals for the distribution of the funds to needy visa students until about mid-March.

Elrond defaults on loan

by Rob Reynolds

For the first time in its brief history Elrond College has been forced to default a payment to Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) the holders of the first mortgage. The decision was reached after consultation with CMHC in early February when it was agreed that the student co-operative would defer the payments for March through until August. According to Roger Bainbridge, a resident of the college who negotiated with the CMHC, a lump sum will be made in October of this year to cover the abeyance of payments over the summer. As the monthly payment is $27,000 the October payment would be $135,000.

In the past Elrond has taken out bank loans, over the summer months, to cover its cash shortfall occasioned by the high vacancy rate in the co-operative over that period. The loans have previously been guaranteed by the university, however the Board of Trustees decided at its February meeting that Queen's would not act a guarantor on the loan for this year. Their decision was based, partially, upon the recommendations of the Principal's Advisory Committee on Elrond, which advised that the college be made to deal with its own financial situation. The report itself, however, is confidential.

According to Bill Young, past Treasurer of Elrond, the shortfall in cashflow came earlier this year than in the past due to 50 unoccupied beds in the college. Young also chaired the Elrond College Review Board composed of representatives of Elrond residents, students and university faculty, which recommended that the university take over ownership of the student co-operative. The proposal was considered unacceptable by both the Elrond Board of Directors and the Board of Trustees of the University.

No working relations with labour

Kingston Socialists split

Anne Johnson

"The Kingston Socialist group is not going anywhere," said Ben Lowe one of eight people who pulled out of the organization two weeks ago. Eight of the group's 35 members decided to withdraw from the Kingston Socialists due to general dissatisfaction over what the KS had been doing. Among those withdrawing from KS were Colin Leys and Grant Amyot of Queen's Political Studies Department, Henry Laycock of the Philosophy Department, and Ben Lowe, Jeff Evenson and Dave Boisvert, all graduate political studies students.

Lowe said that unfortunately the group had not been developing working relations with the Kingston labour force as much as some members would have liked. When asked about future plans, Lowe said that a study group could be formed in order to look at labour problems in Kingston. He realized that the group would be small, but had hopes that it could expand. Lowe could not say whether the withdrawal from the KS would be permanent.

Ross Sutherland, one of those KS members who remained, maintained that the KS was "a very open group with a broad type of perspective," which, up until this point, performed a primarily educative function. The group is at the moment trying to re-evaluate its role because of the "mixed feelings" among the members. Sutherland added that the KS is now in the process of organizing a labour forum for May.

Professor Laycock, of the Queen's Philosophy Department, said that the decision to pull out was mainly individual in nature, and that he himself had no plans for the future.

Confederation seminar here

A seminar on Confederation featuring Principal R.L. Watts and Community and Social Services Minister, Keith Norton, will be held at Queen's on Saturday, April 2. The seminar, sponsored by the local Progressive Conservative youth, will also have as speakers Political Studies prof. George Perlin, Dean of Law Dan Soberman and student Kathy Wood.

Discussion in workshops will follow remarks from the panel. Topics include regional alienation, bilingualism programmes, minority rights, Quebec today, and changes to Confederation. Each member of the panel will lead a workshop.

High school and post-secondary students are encouraged to bring questions and opinions, according to seminar chairman Rob Welch.

The seminar will run from 2-4 p.m. in rooms D and E of Macdonald Hall, Union Street.

Journal Results

by Gerry Lewarne

Michael Scott and Jude Byrne have won the election as co-editors of the Journal. They outpolled Ross Sutherland and Bill Burgess 39-12.

During the campaign, Byrne and Scott emphasized that they wanted to maintain the Journal "at its present high calibre". They say they will want many new people to augment the experienced core that will be at the Journal next year.

Future Perspectives

by Jim Dawson

Future Perspectives Week has been designed to stress some of the problems and issues we face in the short or long term future. The academic community are being given an opportunity to enter into these discussions and bring to the fore issues and problems which may not have arisen but might have to be contended with by mankind in the future.

Moreover, issues such as nuclear power generation, need for economic growth, development of a Conserver Society and solutions to the Energy crisis are examples of controversial topics which need discussion and input. Many courses in a wide range of departments and faculties deal with these issues and 'Future Perspectives' will encourage students and staff to present position papers, participate in panel discussions, open forums or workshops. Papers prepared for courses can be made in a format for submission to relevant governments.

Anyone interested in Future Perspectives Week should contact Mike McMillan of the Education Commission. Suggestions for topics, formats, and speakers will be welcomed.

editorial opinion

Goodbye to all that

Shouting in the wilderness is a tiresome exercise when carried on indefinitely. The Queen's Journal reminded itself of this fact when it voted last Wednesday evening to cast aside its member under protest status at the Canadian University Press (CUP) and withdraw from the organization altogether. In so doing it looked back at over two years of frustrated attempts to come to terms with an organization with which it has increasingly been at odds.

As a founding member of CUP the Queen's Journal has consistently promoted the functional, if by some standards unambitious, objective of maintaining an agency to disseminate news collected from the many university and college campuses around the country. Of course, these dull aspirations were first put into effect before such terms as "objective" and "impartial" were ridiculed and cast into disrepute by the enlightened social scientists who have rallied to the organization in recent years. This new breed of journalist has been concerned lest his benighted brethren should perchance subscribe to the anachronistic values of a society which so grossly exploits him. The problems and shortcomings of our society, having been identified with such consummate ease, a solution is offered which is simply overwhelming by its very neatness: "the destruction of privileged groups who control our industry and government." Having pioneered this profound social analysis, the "Cuppies" (as CUP writers are wont to call themselves), have found it their bound duty to disseminate it along with any relevant news to Canadian students, and presumably await the liberation.

Yet even if CUP's cake-mix prescription for society's ills were objectively valid, the Queen's Journal found itself at a loss to discover what had transformed a simple mechanism for collecting and distributing news into an organism which now regards its erstwhile purpose as virtually immoral.

By any standard, the selection of news for the twice-weekly CUP packages gradually came to bear only the faintest resemblance to the contextual prominence of actual events at universities across Canada. To choose an example, it was stated in the CUP news package last autumn that National Students Day had "reached" 300,000 students, implying a resounding success for an event in which only a small fraction of the student population had actually participated. Surely such attempts to "mobilize students" is tantamount to intellectual dishonesty for it represents a massive distortion of an actual event.

The view that society might profitably be modified in some areas is one which deserves recognition; society has evolved considerably over the years. Yet we disagree that it is for the reporter to leap ahead of events in an effort to promote a certain kind of change according to a particular political philosophy. Traditionally it has been the role of interest groups to promote change and the role of newspapers to chronicle this process according to its objective impact upon society. While recording the actions of student federations is one aspect of this, the inquisitive character of university communities provides numerous other opportunities for reporting progressive thought.

The Journal has found the activist Statement of Purposes for the News Service unacceptable, yet our attempts to seek a revision have been in vain. Pending one final attempt to see our viewpoint prevail, last December we became member under protest of CUP. At the most recent conference in Ottawa, we were again unable to secure the desired changes in the Statement of Purposes. To compound this disappointment, a decision was taken to increase the organization's budget by 70 percent which translates into a membership fee for us next year of roughly $6,500. This could only serve to enhance our dissatisfaction with the product received in return.

"Cash for tax": selling instant gratification

by Bernie Helling

I received my $200-odd tax return in the space of 21 days. Yet some people are willing to sign approximately 30 per cent of their tax refunds into the hands of a racket that promises instant gratification.

Walking down to 135 Princess Street you can see "Cash for Tax" covering the windows of a small store, once a dress boutique. In the upper right-hand corner the 'for rent' sign is already up.

Inside are the tables and chairs where the unfortunate, the unemployed, the ignorant, sit and sign away a large portion of their hard-won money. They are lured by the promise of "Your income tax done for free", they need the money for food, for rent, perhaps for other comforts of life. They don't have to sign away their returns.

Last year such operations were undergoing investigation. This year they have emerged vindicated and legal, to the letter of the law but perhaps not in the spirit of the law.

And yet the market is good, supply and demand apply and there is a high demand for the services of these organizations. In fact, the established tax return companies and finance companies have joined the show, each looking for the quick buck. And we know who suffers. Yet no one is twisting your arm to sign away your return.

They tend to avoid the public eye, they hide behind their papered-over windows lettered with hollow promises. The city of Kingston doesn't even have the Princess Street operation on its tax rolls. The for rent' sign gives an indication of how long they plan to stay in Kingston. In Toronto, the office of Consumer and Commercial Affairs (where new businesses are registered) has little to say about them. The phone company calls them "S and S Stores, Tax Division", no head office available. They will probably be gone by May, only to reappear next year during March.

And yet they can't shoulder all the blame. While their line of work may be offensive to some, they are breaking no laws, they are not even charging exorbitant rates of interest. They are merely buying the rights to a client's tax return at a mutually agreeable price.

The blame, if any, must be laid at the doorstep of the federal gover-ment and the income tax system. The wage earner finds his weekly cheque bitten away, his money held without interest, and is then faced with the prospect of filling out his tax form and waiting until the government sees fit to give. What of the economy that finds so many Canadians out of work and the top-heavy bureaucracy of social-assistance programs?

The whole question has a bitter taste to it. Perhaps legislation could stop the selling of tax returns, but what of the individual's rights? Society works on a series of double standards in this area, condemning some practices while ignoring others. Whatever the case, the situation is crystal clear to the person who signs away his return to pay his rent.

National News Service purposes: relatively unchanged, activist

The Canadian University press recognizes that a class society exists in Canada, and the important role the post-secondary education system plays in maintaining the existing social order. This role is reflected in the policies regarding accessibility to post-secondary education and the resulting composition of the Canadian student body, in the content of the education we receive and is evidenced by the future positions which we are expected to occupy within the economic and social order.

Canadian University press, as an agent of social change, must as its main priority attempt to use its national news service to provide Canadian students with information and analysis of the nature and role of post-secondary education within the Canadian economic and social system, relate the current policies of financial cutbacks being waged against post-secondary and other social services to the general economic crisis facing Canada, and assist students in mobilizing opposition to these policies.

Further, the news service should report on and critically evaluate the role played by existing student organizations in responding to this situation, and encourage change in the leadership and/or structure of these organizations where they fail to recognize their responsibility to mobilize students.

Canadian University press must also use its national news service to provide Canadian students with information and analysis of the capitalist economic system in which we all live, and to assist students in mobilizing against that system where it is found to be preserving the class structure or to be oppressive to women, minorities or others within Canada.

Code of Ethics for the CUP

That student journalists should strive continually to be fair and accurate in their reports, and should strive to equip themselves adequately with facts to support published statements. They should realize fully their personal responsibility for everything submitted for publication. They should not falsify information or documents, nor distort or misrepresent the facts.

Student journalists should respect all confidences regarding sources of information and private documents unless this interferes with the freedom of the press or the need to inform the public on vital matters.

Student journalists should be familiar with the laws of libel and contempt of court which exist in this country and should observe the international copyright agreement, unless this interferes with the freedom of the press or the need to inform the public on vital matters.

The editor should rectify in print, at the first available opportunity all culpable mistakes.

The editor should fully realize his or her personal responsibility for everything published.

Racial and sexual bias or prejudice should have no place in the editorial policy of the newspaper.

CUP's new Statement of Principles

Whereas the Canadian student press believes in the following principles:

That the major role of the student press is to act as an agent of social change, assisting students in understanding and mobilizing against exploitation and injustice wherever it may be found, and emphasizing the rights and responsibilities of the student;

That the student press, in fulfilling this role, must perform both an educative and active function, and critically support groups serving as agents of social change;

That the student press must present local, national and international news fairly, and interpret ideas and events to the best of its ability;

Journal seeks changes

The Queen's Journal, dissatisfied with the existing Statement of Purposes for the National News Service examined the question and came up with what it considered a more appropriate statement. This statement, ratified by the Journal's Editorial Board was forwarded to the National Office of CUP and was presented at the recent national conference in Ottawa. The Journal's suggestion is quoted below. To its left is the Statement which was eventually ratified by the membership.

"The news service shall facilitate the interchange of news and information between the member newspapers. It shall do so in a fashion which reflects, as far as can be done, a true situation from an impartial standpoint. Where there is reason to suspect bias in a news report filed by a member, CUPOTT shall endeavor to further investigate the story that all relevant information and views may be presented.

CUP shall not itself take sides in a news story. Nor will it emphasize in a report the argument of one individual or group in order to promote a point of view.

'NUS and paper owe explanation'

Anyone fortunate enough to secure a copy of this month's Student Advocate, published by that great protector of students' views, the National Union of Students, will notice a front page picture suggesting the great wealth of student discontent in 1976. The picture shows a large body of students protesting tuition fees and their increase.

Fine?—Look again! The picture, in fact, has no relation whatever to the issue at hand. Notice the word "tuition" poorly scrawled across obviously rewritten signs. The white blanks where words should occur show instances where the Editor couldn't think of an appropriate word to twist the meaning toward his purpose. Signs such as "Out Now" (lower left corner) and "Unite Against the War..." (lower right corner) clearly show the picture to have nothing to do with 1976 student protests. It is likely that this picture has nothing to do even with Canada since the large sign "U of ?..." has also been rewritten.

Unfortunately, this blatant dishonesty cannot be dismissed as being comical. It represents the height of journalistic stupidity and it is the product of a supposedly reputable group, the National Union of Students.

This letter has purposely been written before the results of the referendum are released in order that it does not appear as partisan political criticism. This issue is much more important than that. It deals with the integrity of a group claiming to represent students across Canada.

The purpose of the National Union of Students, as outlined on the inside of the paper, is to provide "a lobbying, research and information service to the post-secondary community in Canada." Does the picture on the front of the Student Advocate represent the type of "information" we can expect from NUS? Is this the kind of ethical representation NUS is providing for Canadian students?

To bring the whole matter closer to home, why has this month's issue of The Student Advocate been removed from circulation? Clearly, those responsible have recognized the problem. I suspect that the thousands of copies normally distributed are awaiting the trash can in the AMS office. Is this presenting the true NUS to Queen's students? Would the recognition of NUS dishonesty have influenced the referendum contrary to the AMS's desire for membership in NUS? The timing of the removal of The Student Advocate from circulation seems coincidental with the referendum.

Doubtless, NUS has an explanation. This letter demands an explanation, both from the Editor of The Student Advocate and NUS will probably reply that they needed a "graphic representation" for their story and didn't have one available so they made one up.

"I learned a lesson" from photograph

Dear Editor:

As the March issue of the student advocate came off the press, it was brought to my attention that the obviously retouched photograph which appeared on the front page could be misinterpreted as deliberate insincerity and a misrepresentation of "student protest" in Canada by the Canadian Students' National Newspaper.

I apologize to those who think this photograph was meant to defraud the readership of the Advocate, for indeed this was not the case.

It should be stated that the photograph had not been intended for use in the publication but was included only when a promised photo of a recent Ontario protest did not arrive in time to meet our publication deadline. Now, while this is not an excuse, it must be noted that the pressure of the deadline and the frustration of the individuals who did not carry out their promise lead to a quick, and I now believe unwise, decision to include the photograph in question.

The rationale seemed sound at the Trashy banner

Dear Editor:

One may be able to overlook Suzy-Q, and even pretend that Golden Words does not exist, but some things cannot be ignored. The obscene banner on the roof of Ontario Hall last week is one such item. If many students were fortunate enough to have missed seeing this example of exploitative, insulting trash, it is because Hugh Christie was wise enough to have it removed upon receiving an angry complaint.

I believe the "civil" engineers responsible for this banner owe an apology to every decent man and woman on campus. An open vagina facing University Avenue not only desecrates the beauty of Ontario Hall, but it also causes one to seriously question the mentality of some Queen's students.

time I needed a graphic representation of students in protest and since this photograph was indeed a student protest, I decided to use obvious omissions and substitutions to show that the photo was not meant to point to any particular protest and in fact named several kinds and the photograph was never meant to convey any preference for anyone demonstration above another.

I am the photographer and can therefore guarantee the photo is of a Canadian student demonstration where students really were "angry", also as stated in that cut-line.

I take full responsibility as the photographer, retoucher, designer and editor for what is considered a "sloppy" act and admit that I learned a valuable lesson from this experience.

I thank those who brought this matter to my attention.

Bar rallies and our name

by Ross S. Brown

An important element to the continued success of any university is its reputation and standing in the community at large. For the most part, the University's reputation is reinforced and, hopefully, enhanced by the students and their performances, while at the university and as a graduate in the "real" world. Everything a Queen's student does, his accomplishments, conduct and behaviour, directly reflect on Queen's University and the principles, standards and values for which it symbolizes. Because of this, whether we like it or not, as students we are representatives of Queen's University to the community.

Recently an event took place which, in my opinion, was very damaging to the reputation of Queen's and its students. One Friday a number of students went to Watertown for a bar rally. The events that transpired were disgusting to say the least. Five students were arrested for swearing at a police officer and four for relieving themselves on the sidewalks. And then they had the audacity to complain about being arrested, for after all, they were allowed to do it on campus. What are the Americans going to think? That all Canadian students are a bunch of barbaric animals from an uncivilized, undeveloped frontier?

It was not too long ago when Outer Council spent a good deal of time debating a motion to censure those individuals who disrupted Ambassador Enders' speech, on the grounds that such actions harmed the reputation of Queen's and its students. That motion would have passed had there been quorum.

We cannot maintain a blind eye and just ignore the bar rally. The damage to our reputation and to property, in Kingston as well as in Watertown, was inexcusable and certainly a more serious nature than that at the Enders presentation. Yet, there has not been a single public statement from the AMS, Outer Council, or the University administration to castigate those involved. By remaining silent, these bodies are, in effect, condoning the actions of these individuals. If we persist in remaining silent, events such as the Watertown incident will continue to occur and each one will add another smattering of black to the University's reputation.

When the situation arises, Outer Council must be consistent in showing their disapproval of the student's action. The Council cannot move to censure one group of individuals while ignoring the more serious actions of another group. But the point has been made and illustrated, that events which damage the reputation of Queen's cannot be condoned or ignored. Some form of appropriate action must be taken by the governing bodies on campus. In the future, may the wrath of the University gods descend upon those for their sinful actions.

'Expression of Arrogance'

Vandals on Leonard Field

Dear Editor:

On Wednesday night (March 23) of last week, I witnessed a display of human destructiveness. In the course of an hour, no less than four windows had been broken in the Leonard Field residences by snowballs. The incidents occurred almost one after the other and were quite evidently intentional acts.

The episode began as a pan-Leonard field snowball fight. After the interest of pelting each other had subsided somewhat, their attention was turned to jeering spectators in the windows of McNeil. I watched as the snowballs flew and after a short time, the window broke. At this point, I expected to see all those involved go dashing across the field so they would not be charged for the window. This did not, however, occur. What did happen was that they continued to throw snowballs until the screen had been ripped.

Not satisfied with this, one of the common room windows in Leonard Hall served as a new target. It was also broken. They then proceeded to break one in Brockington and Morris. The last comment that I heard before the group disbanded was a serious, "Let's go break one in Leonard." Fortunately they did not carry this out. But they did leave four broken windows in their wake.

I found it difficult to believe what I had just witnessed. How could supposedly rational, university students do such a thing? How could these men (I question the use of the word men) show such immature and asinine behaviour. I forced myself to believe it.

When there is such disregard for property, as is evident with this vandalism, it really makes me wonder how concerned we really are about tuition fee increases. If this is not enough, the act itself was an expression of arrogance and irresponsibility. It is my hope that people would think before they act if such circumstances should again arise.

Reader critical of Morgentaler

Dear Editor:

This is a response to the full page feature article entitled "Morgentaler speaks out. 'My Duty to lend a hand'" which appeared in the Journal on Friday, March 22, 1977.

I really find it incredible that Morgentaler, and many who support him, can continuously present their views concerning the abortion question in a manner such as appears in this article. Morgentaler stated: "I think people should become more indignant about the continued victimization of women across Canada, because of this cruel and unjust law (Article 61) and that they should make it known to the politicians that they're the majority and that is cruel and barbarous that a law should remain on the books that victimizes women."

Morgentaler's emotionally charged logic is an insult to my intelligence as once again the doctor has stressed "The victimization of women" by a "Cruel and barbarous law" while totally ignoring the fact that abortion involves the killing of an unborn life.

It is my contention that the restraint presently existing within the abortion law is an under-representation of the real social concern held by many about the welfare of the unborn child. Even if Morgentaler could substantiate his belief that the majority share his views it would not serve as an adequate excuse for the tyrannical law reform which he is urging.

Staff Association favors users-only payment plan

Dear Editor:

My attention has been drawn to the Editorial in the issue dated March 15th, with regard to the position of the Queen's University Staff Association on the Universal Users Fee for use of the Physical Education Complex.

The Staff Association agreed that if all groups on campus were to agree to pay the levy of $7.50, then we would do the same, but we added a qualification, that we considered that the users of the facility should be the ones who should be paying for the privilege.

The Staff Association is sympathetic to the problem that students, particularly, are faced with, but as an example, should everyone who comes by bus, or walks to the campus, have to pay a levy for parking space?

If I might correct an error in your Editorial, the Staff Association represents the Clerical and Administrative non-Academic Staff only. We do not represent the Maintenance group who have their own Certified Bargaining Group. The Staff Association, like the Faculty Association, has no legal status, and can only function as an advisory group to assist in the Administration of the University.

Cultures in conflict: ultimate Cdn. movie

Someone should consider making the 'ultimate' Canadian movie, starring two male leads — one English and the other French. In the script the stars could grow up together, going to the same schools and playing for the same hockey teams (for the benefit of American audiences they could even share the same trapline).

Adulthood, however, would find the old pals bitterly divided over some facet of the storied French-English problem. In the heart-rending final scene one friend would be seen to breathe his last while the other could not forget his pride long enough to come to the deathbed.

My short cinematic allegory was inspired by recent news of a particularly vindictive exchange of statements by a federal Cabinet minister and the Premier of Ontario — the issue being a proposed French-language school in the Windsor area. The gist of English reaction to the controversy seems to be the assertion that Ontario has more than fulfilled its bilingualism commitments. As Mr.

Davis puts it, we do have French on our OHIP cards, don't we? (more cake, anyone?). Inevitably, some newspaper correspondents have asked "Who won on the Plains of Abraham, anyway?" This last chestnut among arguments typifies, to me, the naïveté of the belief that culture is so readily changed by warfare as is geography.

This feeling of mine was reinforced during a conversation with an old (bilingual) friend. When I asked Helene, a social science graduate, about the justifications of preserving French culture, she had an interesting response. "English Canada has got the idea somewhere that every French Canadian's fondest dream is to be English-Canadian". I had to agree that there does exist a misconception that French culture is like Unemployment Insurance — something the government subsidizes (and everyone else tolerates) to tide the unfortunate over until 'something better' comes along. It sounded like something I'd always

tacitly assumed myself.

Our talk focused next upon exactly what this thing called culture is, and Helene became very critical of contemporary North American attitudes. "The idea seems to be that cultural activities are merely 'pit stops' that we allow ourselves so that we can then continue to produce and consume things madly. Ideally, we work in order to have a true culture — one that expresses all those things we consider good in life and worth working for." In short, she thought we have things a little ass-backwards.

Could there be in North America, then, a 'something better' to which we could legitimately expect the French Canadian to aspire? At this point I thought not — our French at least believe their culture to be somewhat idealistic. The rest of us, I had to admit aloud, can only grind our teeth a lot over the poverty of our mostly-imported culture.

Helene giggled as she had a last word with me. "Oh yes, we all get a little self-righteous when we're talking about what a disappointment our culture is." Then she winked and added (in French) "of course, sometimes while we're saying such things we're turning off 'All in the Family' and putting on the latest Eagles album, n'est-ce pas?"

On anonymity

Dear Editor

In the Journal issue of March 22, 1977 two letters were published with the name(s) of the Author(s) withheld. I can see no reason why this was done.

The comments about Howard Smith were amusing and the barbs directed towards the apparently non-existent Mr. Smith were relatively mild. Perhaps the author whose name was withheld by request, was the non-existent Mr. Smith his non-self? If so Mr. Smith may wrap up this years effort in journalism with a confession of non-existence. So be it. However, if the author was any person or non-person other than Mr. Smith, I submit that his (her) name or non name should have been published with his (her) comments. Anonymity for notoriety seekers should be available only in special circumstances, the nature of which should be obvious, or if not, fully explained to readers.

The lengthy attack upon Mr. Laycock's feature of March 8, 1977 was difficult to take seriously substantively it is best and most charitably characterized as puerile. However, the letter's merit, or lack thereof, is not the issue I am pursuing. The point is the letter contained nothing which merited anonymity for its author. Mr. Laycock presented his views openly and so became a public target: you Mr. Editor, have failed in your duty by allowing your forum to become a vehicle for shallow sniping from the shelter of a cowardly secrecy. People have the right to confront other people: shadows do not!

Editor note:

The Queen's Journal will withhold names from publication if requested but for legal reasons we must know the authentic name of the author. This is a policy of the paper which changes from year to year with each new editorial board.

Admission to Fourth-Year Honours Faculty of Arts and Science

All students intending to enter the fourth year of an honours program in September 1977 must file an application for admission to honours with the Associate Dean (Studies), F200 Mackintosh-Corry Hall.

Only students who will have completed fourteen courses at the end of the current academic session need apply at this time. Students who will have completed the required fourteen courses at the end of the Spring or Summer Term should make application at that time.

American college papers are BIG BUSINESS ...

EAST LANSING, Mich. — It's altogether possible that journalists have been so preoccupied lately with the takeover exploits of Australian press by Lord Rupert Murdoch that they have lost sight of some other happenings in their profession: the power grab of Mary Ann Chickshaw here at the State News of Michigan State University or Marjorie Leedy's continuing battle for control of the Daily Cavalier at the University of Virginia.

And then there's the $860,000 libel suit against the Ohio State Lantern and the unhappy aftermath of the Pacifican's big scoop about the prostitution ring allegedly operating out of a freshmen women's dormitory on the campus of the College of the Pacific.

It all goes to show that life is going on as usual in the zesty world of college journalism. The new breed of students may be, as has been so widely reported, a quiet lot, obsessed with grades and not as willing to man the barricades as they were during the riotous '60s, but the newsrooms of the college dailies and weeklies are still well-populated with activists looking for causes to champion and iniquitous institutions to expose.

A weekly paycheck

Inevitably, though, there have been changes. No longer is putting out the college paper quite the labour of love it once was. Today the students often are paid for the hours they put in writing news stories or selling ads. "More and more it's like an internship," says Lillian Lodge Kopenhaver, President of the National Council of College Publications Advisers. "Staffers receive a salary and get their education at the same time. No more working on some non-career job like waiting on tables to earn their tuition money."

The State News is probably the biggest moneymaker of all the college papers. It expects to take in more than one million dollars this year largely from advertising. Catering to a student body of 44,500 and 2500 faculty members, it has a circulation of more than 33,500 and a paid staff of 115. It towers over its only local competition, the 10,000-circulation Towne Crier, to say nothing of other student-run publications such as The Orifice, put out by medical students, and the black oriented People's Choice.

"On many campuses, the college paper isn't what it used to be," comments Stephen Rivkin, Vice President of Ries Cappiello Colwell Inc., a New York advertising agency. "It's big business."

So big, in fact, that on one campus — the University of Iowa — the student journalists have even formed a union to press their wage demands on the college newspaper, the Daily Iowan. The big problem, according to the staffers, was inequities in pay. "We believed that a number of editors were working just as hard as other editors but were receiving a lot less," Rhonda Dickey, editor of the editorial page, says. Reporters' salaries used to range between $75 and $300 a month; now they all receive $237 a month. The news editor, however, has been cut back to $360 a month from $460. The union, called simply "The Union," has a contract with Student Publications Inc., a non-profit corporation set up by the University to make the paper autonomous.

The news people received retribution to some degree by having the State News endorse Eugene McCarthy in last fall's presidential election, a choice that wasn't very popular with the ad men. And then there was the strange happening with the McDonald's hamburger ad, which no one can explain. The quarter-page ad showed a curly-haired student thoughtfully taking a break from the books. The headline declared: "Fill Up That Empty Sunday Night Feeling." Unfortunately, in the middle of the ad was an odd little flag containing the word "rape" as though the hamburger chain was recommending this type of activity.

"Somewhere along the line 'rape' was misplaced from a story about concern over rapes on the campus," says Bob Hoffman, a 20-year-old student ad man. "Naturally, we had to run another ad, but McDonald's probably got more attention with the first one than it did with the second one."

Nevertheless, the State News gets high scores from most advertisers both for the responsibility of its operations and for selling products. "It is one of the well-run papers," says John Hanson, vice-president of National Education Advertising Services (NEAS), New York, which places national advertising in college papers.

The bulk of college newspaper advertising comes from local merchants, restaurants, movies and taverns. At the State News there is very little that can't be advertised. The paper accepts ads for porno movies and abortion clinics ("only those that can be verified as responsible operations," says the classified ad manager). But the Michigan State newspaper does draw the line at ads from organizations selling term papers or theses. And it occasionally rejects ads it considers "distasteful" or "unfair." Two such examples were national ads for Qui and National Lampoon magazines, which were rejected for being "sexist."

Libel is a growing hazard for college papers. Pasted over the desk of David Dempsey, student editor of Western Michigan University's campus newspaper, the Western Herald, is a clipping that relates how a local Kalamazoo citizen won $75,000 damages against the paper.

"It's a reminder of what not to do," he says.

The case has a significance that goes well beyond Kalamazoo for, according to the sketchy records on campus libel, it apparently is the first sizable court-ordered libel judgement against a campus newspaper in 20 years. As a result, many colleges are re-examining their libel protection; and 13 of the largest college newspapers have joined the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and purchased libel insurance available through membership in that group.

The Western Herald suit resulted from an editorial on Nov. 1, 1972, that asserted that Norman H. Bruex, owner of the Kalamazoo Publishing Co. was affiliated with the rightwing Minuteman organization. Supporters of Mr. Bruex, who was running for the state legislature at the time, were described as "vigilantes." Mr. Bruex sued the paper for $800,000, contending that the editorial humiliated him and hurt his printing business. He was awarded the $75,000 damages but eventually agreed with the university to settle for $50,000.

Today, the Western Herald has $1 million of libel coverage for an annual premium of $500 a year, about twice what the paper paid a few years ago.

Suing the Lantern

The award-winning Ohio State Lantern is currently fighting a libel suit. Last year the Lantern published two stories by student reporters alleging violations of city housing codes at certain student residences off-campus. Charles William O'Brien, a Columbus realtor, was interviewed and photographed by the paper in connection with the stories. Mr. O'Brien hit back with an $860,000 suit, charging libel and invasion of privacy.

Of more concern, however, to most student editors is the "prior restraint" that occurs when a college administrator decides that a news article or editorial is offensive and prevents its publication.

Says Chris Fager of the Student Press Law Center of Washington, D.C., "The better the student journalists get, the more apt they are to get under the skin of people. Nowadays, even in high school, they are doing investigative reporting. So when the campus papers take out after the college administration or the student governing body, all too often the administrators turn around and take punitive action against the paper."

Typical is the plight of Marjorie Leedy, editor of the Daily Cavalier. Last year the paper ran a story that Frank L. Hereford, president of the University of Virginia, who belonged to what it described as a racially exclusive country club. (Subsequently he resigned from the club.) The paper also ran a transcript of a closed "honour trial" where a woman student was accused of cheating on a test. The woman gave the paper permission to run the transcript, Miss Leedy says.

A chilling effect

These stories apparently resulted in the reviving, last fall, of an organization called the Media Board of Directors. This board consists of a committee of students appointed by the President of the University; it has the power to remove the management of a campus publication without stating cause. Thus far the board hasn't acted, but its presence "has a chilling effect of First Amendment rights," Miss Leedy says.

Ned Tolbert, editor of the Pacifican, the student-run weekly newspaper at the College of the Pacific in Stockton, Calif., suffered a harsher fate. Selected by the student senate as editor, Mr. Tolbert got into a disagreement with the senate's finance committee over the paper's proposed budget for 1976-77. Then he ran a front-page story alleging the existence of a prostitution ring operated by freshmen women seeking money to pledge sororities and frequented by, among others, members of the football team (A key source for the Pacifican's story later recanted his charge.)

The following week Mr. Tolbert was dismissed as editor by the student senate. Later he was convicted by the Joint University Judiciary, a body consisting of three students, three faculty members and three administrators, of "irresponsible use of the student newspaper" and placed on disciplinary probation for the remainder of his time at the university.

Even at the State News, not known for muckraking journalism and supposedly independent of administration influence, there have been conflicts over autonomy. The paper's board of directors — composed of three students, three faculty members and two outside journalists — last year objected to a candidate for editor who had the backing of the news staff and appointed Mrs. Chickshaw, the current editor. As a result, about two-thirds of the news staff briefly walked off the job but later accepted Mrs. Chickshaw's appointment.

Queen's Chamber Orchestra

Music of the 18th and 20th centuries

Queen's Chamber Orchestra will feature music which alternates between the 18th and 20th century when they present their fourth and final concert for this season in Grant Hall on Friday, April 1 at 8:30 p.m.

Five soloists are to perform with the orchestra in this concert. Fourth-year Maria Cooper, the trombone soloist in "Overture for Strings and Trombone" by Hovhanness, is a student of Dr. John Upchurch. She is second trombone with the Kingston Symphony Orchestra as well as being a member of the Queen's Jazz and Wind Ensembles.

Flautists Pamela Scothorn and Karen Keen join forces in Cimarosa's

"Concerto for Two Flutes and Orchestra". Pamela, who is completing her fourth year as a Bachelor of Physical Health Education student, hails from Ottawa. She is now a piccolo player with the Kingston Symphony Orchestra. Both she and Karen Keen, are pupils of Donelda Hunter. Karen, whose home is in Scarborough is completing her fourth year in the Bachelor of Music program. Student conductor Tony Ciccone will conduct the orchestra's performance of J.C. Bach's "Sinfonia in B. Flat, Op. 21 No. 3". Often called the "English" Bach, J.C. Bach was the youngest son of the great J.S. Bach. A third-year trumpet major, Tony Ciccone has appeared earlier this year as conductor of the Junior Choral Ensemble.

Mozart's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra No. 4" will feature violinist Jennifer Law. A native of Kingston, Jennifer, a winner of several scholarships and awards, who studies with Deszo Vaghy, plays with the Kingston Symphony Orchestra.

This is the second year in which Clifford Crawley, who also conducts the Kingston Symphony Youth Orchestra, has directed the 34 members of the Queen's Chamber Orchestra. There is no admission charge for Friday's concert which is the last concert to be presented by Queen's Music Department for the current season.

Queen's Wind Ensemble

A Varied Programme

Queen's Wind Ensemble will conclude their eighth consecutive season with a concert in Grant Hall on Tuesday, March 29 at 8:30 p.m. under the Baton of Duane Bates. Admission is free.

A varied programme of music from the 19th and 20th centuries by composers Holst, van Otterloo, Toch, Cable, Rogers, Tull and Ives portrays a wide range of moods and styles.

Humor in music is illustrated in Charles Ives' hilarious "Variations on America" and Canadian composer Howard Cable's rollicking "Newfoundland Rhapsody" a medley for concert band which is truly entertaining and in keeping with the robust jollity and flavour of the folk-songs themselves. A more light-hearted touch is represented by German born American composer Ernst Toch's "Spiel fur Bas Orchest-er". The featured work on the programme is Bernard Rogers' colourful piece "Three Japanese Dances". A showpiece for the percussive section it requires many players and a large range of percussive equipment. Mezzo-soprano Gail Hohner will join the ensemble for the vocal solo.

Fisher Tull's "Variation on an Advent Hymn" scored for large brass choir and percussion, highlights the virtuosic capabilities of individual instrumentalists in the brass section. William van Otterloo's beautiful work "Symphonietta" displays an understanding of wind instruments and unique talent for combining them to produce a continuous piece although there are three movement-like contrasting sections.

MacArthur Dramatic Arts

Three Plays for Women

As is the case with many drama departments, women predominate at the MacArthur dramatic arts department. For this reason, three plays with mainly female casts will be presented this Wednesday, Thursday and Friday in the main auditorium of the college.

Tanned is a play by the Canadian playwright Brian Wade and it deals with a conversation among three women vacationers who discuss what it means to be a woman today as they sun in cottage country.

The second play, Lament for Harmonica [Maya] by Gwen Ringwood deals with the plight of a 19 year old Indian girl whose path has led her to prostitution - corruption by a white society.

Finally, there'll be Cobble Stick to Thy Last by Kay Hill, a play set in colonial Nova Scotia dealing with death and love in a comic fashion. All three works are by Canadian playwrights.

Record Review

Exposing the pit-falls of Los Angeles

by Bob Murphy

In the space of their relatively short, yet auspicious, career the Eagles have managed the successful synthesis of folk, country, blue-grass and rock into what has become known as "California Rock". It is this peculiar brand of music which has carried them to the top of the heap, but, apparently, not without a few of those afflictions which seem to inevitably haunt the successful. Hotel California, the band's sixth release (including Greatest Hits) concerns itself largely with exposing the pitfalls of the L.A.-based life-style and musical niche into which the Eagles find they have fallen.

The group, while it doesn't exactly turn its back on its past musical direction, definitely takes another step closer to rock—perhaps prompted by the departure of Bernie Leadon and the addition of guitarist, song-writer Joe Walsh (late of James Gang and Barnstorm, as well as having two fine solo outings to his credit.) It's a move which, I personally find, makes them much more accessible. At the same time there's nothing here that's going to cause supporters of their previous work to turn away. The trademark harmonies and impeccably crafted songs remain, and Don Henley (handling the bulk of the vocal chores) is singing better than ever before. Bill Szymczyk's production is clean and clear as a bell.

As for how the band views their situation, the titles say a lot. There's "Wasted Time", "Victim of Love", "The Last Resort", all smacking of desperation and weary disgust for their type of existence. "Life in the Fast Lane" and "Hotel California" paint similarly bleak portraits of California living.

"We are all just prisoners here, of our own device", says one patron of the Hotel California, while the night man adds with a tone of finality: "You can check out any time you like but you can never leave."

The band's stance is cleverly set up to make them look like unwitting victims who see the evils of their culture, yet remain helplessly ensnared in it. It's a stance which is bound to be offensive to many within that culture, and would be much more so did the observations not come from the inside, and not ring so true.

Musically the album is the Eagles' strongest yet. Walsh makes his presence most felt on "Victim of Love" and "Life in the Fast Lane" with his relentless guitar attack, and on his shimmering fairy tale, "Pretty Maids All in a Row", which might have been pulled from one of his solo efforts. He may also be responsible for the touches of sophistication that, while sometimes lacking on previous Eagles records, present themselves here—on the Steely Dan influenced "New Kid in Town", for instance, or through the ever so subtle reggae feel given to "Hotel California".

The other thing that emerges most favourably from the album is the excellence of Don Henley's lead vocals. His singing has always been adequate but had never really challenged the other members' performances. Here, though, his leads stand out, particularly his handlings of the title cut and "The Last Resort."

The Eagles just seem to get better and better. The fact that they persist in making thoroughly enjoyable records seems to dispel what many suggest—that they have backed themselves into a musical corner. Whether they have, or not, seems less important than that they have managed to succeed under those conditions.

It has long been the case in folk music and classical music as well that the solo musician was the absolute focal point of the curious gaze of the onlookers. However it was not until the new wave of jazz drummers in the sixties that the brass bourgeoisie were confident enough to step out from behind the perennial rhythm section and explore the prospects of solo saxophone concerts. The polyrhythms hunted at by Elvin Jones and later expanded upon by Sunny Murray broke the bonds of conformity and no longer was the sax man laying down a solo over a drum beat: he was now interacting continuously with a percussionist. Also credit must be given to the late John Coltrane whose chordal 'sheets of sound' approach to the soprano saxophone was fundamental in the evolution of this new solo voice. Newly acquired freedom must be channeled into a tangible form and in 1966 it was the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM) under the leadership of Muhal Richard Abrams that gave a new school of creative musicians the required confidence to seek out new limits of improvisation from the solo outlook. Foremost in this development was Anthony Braxton. By the time he came to enter the realms of Chicago's experimental AACM he was avidly following both the European and black American musical heritages backward and forward in time to Coleman, Dolphy, Stockhausen and Cage. Dolphy had recorded solo in the early sixties on several rare occasions, but it was Braxton who was to step out into the ravaging world of critics just recovering from the wake of Coltrane and release an entire album of solo saxophone 'For Alto' in 1967. Naturally, Braxton's dismissal of a rhythm section was met with much disavowal by the jazz 'intelligentsia' but few could fault the virtuosity with which he handled his barrage of reeds ranging from E-flat soprano to the bizarre contrabass clarinet. Braxton has matured to the most consistent innovator of the 1970's and in his continuing search for new frontiers he has recorded with large orchestras, the famous quartet 'Circle', assorted duets and trios, Musica Electronica Viva, as well as releasing another two record solo set. Braxton's concerts are extremely well attended in Toronto; witness the surging success of his recent duet concert at A Space with his friend and fellow musician, Roscoe Mitchell.

Roscoe Mitchell was with Braxton from the start. He was another founding member of the AACM in 1966 and he formulated a legendary collective, the Art Ensemble of Chicago. Mitchell, encouraged by Braxton's ambitious endeavours, has explored the solo saxophone in un-concert performances and on a Sackville recording. His is a much more harsh approach to the instruments and may clear out the crowds at your next party.

Steve Lacy was a firm believer in tradition. He formed a quartet in the early sixties which was totally dedicated to the music of Thelonious Monk. However, as his soprano sax improvisations became more abstract, Lacy in the footsteps of Braxton embarked on a solo career. Lacy writes "When I heard Braxton do it successfully I knew I could do it too. You have to control your material very carefully, you must keep the whole space alive by yourself, you have no drums, no help, and this was a challenge for me to organize my material so that I could keep the interest alive with a single voice. I try to concentrate on the rhythm which is the most element in a solo concert. In other words rhythm for me is when you do something, and what you do afterwards, and the distance between them and the proportions. Rhythm is the most difficult thing in solo concerts and also the sound because it is based on sound and no sound, that is all you have in solo performance."

The horizons cleared by trend-setters such as Braxton, Mitchell and Lacy have prompted other serious jazz innovators to investigate this expanding facet of jazz. Oliver Lake, Lee Konitz, Joseph Jarman, Marion Brown, Julius Hemphill and Leo Smith are just some of the new wave of musicians who have recorded and/or performed in the solo horn context. The 'A Space' concert series in Toronto is a direct effort to encourage such attempts. In conclusion, I would strongly give Anthony Braxton credit for being the person to initiate in an absolute sense, the concept of solo for the greater improviser and also for establishing that the so called single line instrument has more possibility for solo work and other areas of expression than people have understood.

Drama Department Production

Tartuffe - a good evening's entertainment

by Eric Hughes

There is definitely something very disturbing about Moliere's Tartuffe. Evil does not go unpunished, but it comes awfully close to ruining the lives of a very charming family. And that most obviously seems to be the essence of the play: no one is really immune to these twists of fate, and what can seem mischievous at one moment becomes a threat to one's very existence the next.

The Queen's Drama department production takes some well-placed steps in this direction - perhaps not as many as it could or should have - but enough to give us some indication of what Moliere was saying with his play.

To begin with, George Pothitos, as the title character, insinuates himself onto the stage rather than entering in the broad comic manner more traditionally associated with the role. Instead of stealing the focus of the play (something which he could certainly have done very well, had he chosen to), Pothitos' Tartuffe represents a foreign force entering the house to disrupt the lives of its occupants, the Orgon family. This is a most effective characterization as it makes his come-uppance thoroughly satisfying and also helps to maintain what I think to be a most playable balance between the family and the intruder.

The Orgon family itself was a group of pleasant if slightly naive people, put upon by the evil genius of their criminal-in-residence, Tartuffe. Andrea Howard, as Orgon's wife Elmire, was elegantly beautiful in appearance, gracefully intelligent in action and, above all, a thorough embodiment of all that we may (though possibly chauvinistically) call attractively feminine. Ms. Howard has that welcome ability to portray a character, no matter how theatrical in essence or context, with truth. Most satisfying.

Phil Tarrant as the easily fooled Orgon was very sympathetic, yet not complete. The character could certainly have been made to look either more or less ridiculous, and our grip on him would have been a little less tenuous. Once Tarrant finds Orgon, his entire performance could come up to the level of his few, but effective comic moments.

Anne Mackeen as the matriarch of the house, Mme. Pernelle, was delightful. She took command of the opening scene (which was threatening to become a bit manic) and kept it at an even keel with her flawless feel for the rhyming couplet verse and firm character study.

David Crean was conservatively sage as Elmire's brother Cleonte, but his scenes with Tarrant tended to drag - possibly because there was little interplay between the two men to illustrate what was behind Cleonte's long speeches. Len Whalen's hot-headed Damis was just right and Karen Heagle and Neil Langley as the lovers Marianne and Valere were attractively immature.

The performance of the evening, however, was Wendy Crewson as Dorine, the family's loud-mouthed and overly-bold serving girl. Her Lucille Ball takes and effectively varied vocal delivery had me in stitches. Ms. Crewson took Dorine in both her hands and held her high for all of us to see. It's not often that we see such shamelessly broad but beautifully worked comedy because there are few people who can pull it off. Ms. Crewson can and does!

Technically, the show was uneven. There was nothing to complain about in Luc logna's lighting design; and Eileen Raynor's costuming was excellent. Ms. Raynor obviously put a lot of research and analysis into her design, the end result being both flattering to the actors and revealing to their characters. And the costumes were very well executed. A commendable job. Sarah Gibson's set, however, left a lot to be desired. I found it very tacky in many spots, and not particularly conducive to any sort of movement. I think this is one of the reasons that several scenes in the play seem too static, and what movement there was was repetitive. The colour was much too deep for the size of the stage as it seemed to dwarf the characters and lend a rather claustrophobic feel to the proceedings. The set painting, however, was commendable (with the exceptions of the horrible downstage benches.)

Director Maurice Breslow presents a very conventional Tartuffe. You must look long and hard to find anything innovative here - but then innovation for its own sake is rather empty. However, I feel he could have been more specific in his delineation of the character groups in the play, i.e. the family, the lovers, the servants, and finally Tartuffe himself. The actors were moving that way, but the underbrush had not yet been cleared from their paths.

Still, the evening with the Orgon family and guests had its enjoyable moments, though the production was almost marred for me by the many rude Drama 100 students taking notes (I'll say it!) during the performance in order to write critiques as part of their drama course. How can you watch a performance and write at the same time? If you can't remember something when you leave the theatre it is not significant enough to impress you and therefore not worth writing about. Someone should stand at the door of productions and confiscate pencils and paper, just as they do cameras. This note-taking is annoying both to fellow audience members and to the actors on stage. Most inconsiderate.

The Queen's production, in spite of all this, left me with a healthy appreciation of some fine writing and fine acting. Tartuffe continues this Thurs. Fri. and Sat. in Con Hall. Curtain time is 8:30 p.m.

Ontario asks Queensman to trials but - Outouais, Ticats share 1st

Saturday's indoor field hockey tournament held at the Phys-Ed Center proved to be an exciting day for all who participated or who took time out to watch. Playing in the Bartlett gymnasium, the Queen's Men's teams fared well against stiff opposition from two premier Ontario teams. Against the Hamilton Ti-Cats, last year's Ontario Field Hockey champions, the firsts lost a closely fought game 6-5, then went on to tie the Outouais F.H.C. 1-1. The Queen's second team took advantage of the smaller Ross Gym to slow down the Hamilton attack and took a two goal lead early in the match. The game remained tight until the dying minutes, when Hamilton scored two quick goals, leaving the final score 8-5. Against Ottawa, the seconds lost 3-1. The visitors were clearly pleased with the calibre of hockey provided, and it was recommended that some Queen's players attend the trials for the Ontario provincial squad this May. The final game for first place ended in a tie, so both the Outouais and Hamilton clubs were declared winners.

Players look to freestyle calisthenics for relief in field hockey action last weekend at Queens

The Women's section, although drastically reduced in scope through a last-minute withdrawal on the part of the University of Toronto, saw many spirited games, brought on particularly by the apparent determination of the Outouais ladies to walk away from the tournament undefeated. After squeaking past the Queen's III (and Janice Deakin) in the first game 2-1, they then defeated both the Queen's II and I teams. However, in the final match for first place, the Queen's first team came alive, spurred on by solid goaltending from Donna Buchan, and won their section of the tournament with a 2-1 victory. Congratulations for a superlative effort on the part of all Queen's players.

Rowing program to begin in fall

After many unsuccessful attempts to establish a rowing program at Queen's, there will definitely be a Crew formed in the fall of this year. Over the past eighteen months, groups of people from the community, with an interest in the sport, have come together to form the Kingston Rowing Club. In September, both men's and women's crews will be rowing out of the K.R.C., which is to be situated on the Orchard Street Park property, on the Cataraqui River. We have managed to obtain experienced coaches, in the persons of John Armitage and Ian MacFarland, both men having coached at the national level.

The Kingston Rowing Club is in the process of purchasing shells, and hope to commence on the water operations next month, with the High School season. This summer it is hoped that a club program will function, providing the necessary oarsman and women are available. The University Council on Athletics is prepared to support rowing, provided that sufficient interest from students is shown in the fall. In order that Queen's have competitive crews next year, we are asking all those people (both men and women) who have rowed, and those interested in starting, to sign the lists in the locker rooms at the Phys Ed Centre, or contact either Don Lindsay (544-7064) or Mark Evans (544-7267). It is hoped that by establishing contact with those interested, that programs for conditioning, information about the coaches, and questions about rowing in general, can be dealt with now, in order that we are ready to row in early September.

Coach in Greco

by Alex Faseruk
Last weekend two Golden Grapplers represented Queen's at the Canadian Open Wrestling Championships held at McMaster University in Hamilton. Neither Roy Worthington or Del DeMonte fared well in the freestyle competition. Instead they saved their talents for the Greco-Roman competition. In Greco-Roman wrestling, the participant is not allowed to secure a hold below his opponent's waist and cannot trip his opponent in any way. The leap can only be used for balance.

In the 220 lbs. weight class Coach Roy Worthington captured the silver medal. His second place finish was to the American champion who represented the United States at the 1976 summer Olympics in Montreal. Finishing behind Roy in third place was Larry Faseruk of the Etobicoke Amateur Wrestling Club.

At 180½ lbs. Del DeMonte picked up a fifth place finish and was just barely shut out of the medals.

Coach Roy Worthington is now in the process of forming the Kingston Wrestling Club. Anyone interested in participating within the new club is asked to contact Roy through the Physical Education office or to phone Ms. Jeanne Supple, Membership Director at 542-3698.

Retirement: The Athlete's Dilemma

by Chris Chenoweth

One of the things which April brings in, other than exams, is the end of the season for hockey and basketball fans. Suddenly a whole group of sports addicts must shift their minds from the violent thuggery of a hockey game to the art of teeing off at the fourteenth hole, or chasing flyballs in the balmy sun. But what few fans realize that, just as for many students, the end of the season can mean retirement from a way of life for many professional athletes.

Most people who work an eight hour day for years become conditioned to the thought of retirement. College kids can always fall back on "going up north to make some bucks" or family contacts to start a new career. But for the professional athlete, retirement is almost frightening. Consider the frustration for the hockey pro who was once the center of thousands of sports fans adulation, and who suddenly becomes unproductive and eliminated from his career. No pension plan can compensate the athlete for the abrupt end to glory or excitement which retirement brings. An athlete can only become a spectator while the younger students of the game take his place.

Some of the greats have had the opportunity to carry on careers related to the skills of their former lives. Jean Beliveau and Henri Richard can at least endorse milk cartons and aspirin, or make speeches at annual Kiwanis dinners. A rare breed of athlete can carry on for a few years after he should have quit the game, playing because he's really got little else to do and some legs left to carry him. In this sense, Gordie Howe could be considered the "professional student" of hockey.

But some of the stars just can't handle the whole retirement question. It was especially rough for the athlete of fifteen years ago, when the salaries were so low that the end of a career meant the end of any means of immediate support. Maurice Richard, perhaps the greatest in the N.H.L., sells fishing tackle for a living. Doug Harvie scouts out taverns for the Atlanta Flames, while Eddie Shack plays in semi-pro leagues for $5 a day. Somehow its just not a fitting ending for those greats who provided years of exhilaration for thousands of Canadian hockey fan addicts.

Today the sports star can make enough fast cash in high salaries to put himself in lifelong comfort. Bobby Orr may never play hockey again at 30, but when he has $3 million tucked away compliments of the Chicago Black Hawks, he doesn't have to worry.

But for the run-of-the-mill sports figure, the average defenceman who quietly passes through his pro years, retirement is still only a disappointment. The "Joe athlete" has to content himself with pushing life insurance instead of a puck on national television. The fond memories under the lights are training for little else.

If I can draw an example a little closer to home - for many students who have worked hard for an Honours BA, retirement from the academic ranks means little else but finishing an experience which does not prepare for what comes afterwards. Yet for the student now entering the job market, the problem is simply to find a fulfilling occupation. However for the professional athlete now entering a new phase of his life, retirement still only means trying to make ends meet with fishing tackle.

Indian election

The five party Janata coalition defeated the party of Indira Gandhi in the recent Indian elections. Not only did Mrs. Gandhi lose the election, but both she and her son were defeated in their own ridings.

On Thursday Morarji Desai, leader of the Janata party, was sworn in as Prime Minister. Mr. Desai, 61, was handpicked by Mr. Narayan and J.B. Kripalani, two disciples of Mahatma Gandhi, in order to avoid a public squabble between the Janata and its ally, the Congress for Democracy. By itself the Janata has 270 members, two short of a full majority in the parliament.

Mr. Desai told reporters that he expected relations between Canada and India to improve. He noted that until recently Canada and India have always had a good relationship and blames recent problems on the outgoing Gandhi government. However Mr. Desai stated that it was unlikely that India would change its nuclear policy under his leadership. Mr. Desai indicated that India would follow a foreign policy that is "fully non-aligned". He was not happy with the Indo-Soviet friendship treaty signed in 1971 by Mrs. Gandhi and Leonid Brezhnev.

Shrugs for us

last week, said that students should not expect the government to guarantee them jobs just because of their education.

The Prime Minister also said that if students could not find jobs in Canada, they should go to another country. "If they (students) don't like it here, let them find a country where they could use university graduates and if they can't use them anywhere else it's because there are too many university graduates, that's all."

On marijuana, Trudeau said that the government is ready to go ahead with legislation making simple possession no longer a criminal offence. "The spirit of Government policy is that if you have a joint and are smoking it for private pleasure, you shouldn't be hassled. If you are deliberately going out to break a law, you should get a kick in the ass."

Pakistani strikes

The national strike called in Pakistan early last week by the Pakistan National Alliance has resulted in rioting in several cities. The strike was called by the opposition coalition to protest alleged frauds in the March 7 general elections in Pakistan, when Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and his party regained office.

The strike shut down public transport, businesses and industries. Soldiers were called in to man trains and patrol the streets in several cities. As a result of rioting in the cities seven people, including both policemen and protesters, were killed.

The arrest of three prominent opposition leaders led to an hour-long clash between several thousand demonstrators and police. Maulana Mufti Mahmud, Maulana Shah Ahmed Noorani, and Malik Mohammad Qasim were arrested because they proposed to lead a protest march in defiance of government orders against public gatherings.

The three were released two hours later, and went straight into deliberations on whether to enter into a dialogue with Prime Minister Bhutto. The opposition party refuses to recognize the March 7 election results, claiming Mr. Bhutto's party resorted to massive rigging in order to regain power.

Archbishop slain

Emile Cardinal Biazenda, Archbishop of Brazzaville, was murdered last Tuesday night, only five days after the assassination of Congo President, Marien Ngouabai. The 11-man military committee which has ruled the Congo since the president's assassination, claimed that the death of Biazenda was the work of former president Alphonse Massamba-Debat. Mr. Massamba-Debat is under arrest, and is also accused of being behind the death of President Ngouabai.

Bank hostages

Last Monday Bob McLagan walked into a Toronto bank and held the employees at gunpoint as he demanded a Hercules military plane to fly him to Uganda. McLagan said he wanted to see his "pal Idi Amin" and that even though he'd never met the man he was a fan of his and wanted to fight for him.

McLagan first entered the Bank Canadian National at the corner of King and Yonge around noon on Monday. The surrounding streets were soon cordoned off as Metro police began negotiating with the gunman. During the afternoon McLagan had several interviews with radio reporters who managed to phone the bank and emphasized that he wanted to get to Uganda and had no interest in robbing the bank.

In the middle of the afternoon the female employees were released leaving only four male hostages in the bank. About 4 pm a Hercules transport was moved to Downsview airport in Toronto and readied for McLagan. But the plane was never used — McLagan gave himself up to the police at 11:30 Monday night. Metro police Chief Harold Adamson said that special procedures developed over the past two years were used to persuade the gunman to surrender.

When McLagan appeared in provincial court Tuesday morning a psychiatric exam was ordered.

Odds and odds

Nature lovers in Llandrindod Wells, a Welsh town, are helping the toads. These conscientious people come out at night and carry bucketfuls of toads across busy roads to their spawning grounds in an effort to prevent the large numbers of squashings incurred every year on these journeys.

A prisoner in a Sydney prison went swimming in his cell. He stuffed cracks around the door with toilet paper and bread, wrenched the toilet from the floor and let the water rise to the window bars. When the cell door was finally opened, he surfed "out to the yard" with the rush of the water.

Hijacked cab

A Belleville cab was hijacked outside the city last Friday and the cabbie was forced at gun point to drive to Cobourg. The two hijackers then robbed him of $103, tied him up and left. The cabbie freed himself and phoned the police. The hijackers, who took the cab, are still at loose

Keep historic sites

Mayor Ken Keyes gave a "hands off" warning to realtors who wish to redevelop Kingston's historic sites. He wants to preserve them, and he reminded realtors of the city laws which protect such sites.

Also in his talk to the realtors last week he mentioned his doubts that the Place d'Armes complex will be ready this year. He feels that the land between Princess and Brock on Barrie Street is a disgrace to the city. It is owned by Ramada Inn, but the mayor doubts that the Corporation will ever build an Inn on this property. Local developers have shown an interest in eventually constructing a complex here.

City crime

Police chief Gerald Rice has good and bad news to offer. Break-ins in city businesses have substantially decreased in the last two months, but residential break-ins are on the increase. As a remedy to this situation the police department will select various residential areas of the city and have officers inform the homeowners in these areas on how best to protect their properties. He says that this year's 24 percent increase in residential break-ins can only be stopped by public co-operation.

Old age in Kingston

Senior citizens here often have to spend from 60 to 80 percent of their income on rent in order to avoid rats, vermin, flights of stairs, dingy quarters and unsafe neighborhoods.

The Senior Citizens Council of Kingston is worried about the plight of the elderly on fixed incomes or on too small pensions. In order to help

Engineers petition to stop Judge from hearing case

by Anne Johnson

Engineering '77 students may be presenting a petition to the Queen's Grievance Board in order to prevent Mike Yearly, AMS Court Chief Justice from hearing the upcoming Wednesday, April 6, 1977 case in which 15 graduating Engineers have been charged with damage to Victoria Hall after their year-end "bash" on March 24, 1977. Damages amounted to $1200.00.

"We do not dispute the authority of the AMS Court" to hear the case, said one Engineering '77 student, but they do not believe that Mr. Yearly can be impartial after talks with the prosecutor and the complainant. As well, the students are upset because of the Court's decision not to allow the students to have legal counsel.

According to Bob Parry, a Queen's law student, "We feel it is not a constitutional move on the part of the Court."

Yearly emphasized that the Court was only a Board of Inquiry and that it was the Court's unanimous decision to do away with both defense counsel and prosecution in order to avoid technical legal arguments which will only complicate the matter. "If the Court was a court, (which it is not), there might be a little more substance to their complaint than there is," said Yearly. "It seems incredible to suggest that I have an attitude of bias for anyone," he emphasized. "I am not out to crucify the students, I am just keen to find out as much as possible about the matter."

According to Yearly, even if the petition was presented to the Board of Inquiry, the hearing will still be heard on Wednesday night. "I'm concerned if it were put off, by the time the case could be heard, the students concerned will have graduated, and will no longer be under the AMS Court's jurisdiction."

The damage to the women's residence took place after the fourth year stag party which featured a live stripper.

Confederation debates, workshops

Personal appeals needed to keep us together: Watts

Principal Watts, one of five panelists at a Conference on Confederation Saturday, put the Quebec issue in a historical context, arguing that in the past, problems in federal states have always ended in violence. Watts seemed to see violence in Canada as inevitable.

Watts pointed out the need for personal appeals to Quebecers, suggesting that Queen's students should consider going to Laval University, for example, talk to Quebecers and find out what they are thinking.

George Perlin of the Politics Department spoke of the need for reworking the whole federal structure, without concentrating on Quebec. He said that each province should be able to say why it wants to stay in Confederation. Before Canada can resolve the Quebec issue, he said, all the provinces must reassess their roles in Confederation. The present system does not appear to be working, each province experiencing some degree of resentment, Perlin pointed out.

Dean of Law Dan Soberman, concentrating on the reactions of Canada since the November 15 election, was concerned about the overemphasis on the Quebec issue. He felt that the news media and politicians have been exploiting the issue for their own personal gain.

Panelist Kathy Wood spoke of the many cultures and sheer size of the country, using the vertical mosaic motif, something Canadians should be proud of, in comparison to the American tradition of assimilation. Ontario Community and Social Services Minister Keith Norton commented on the recent Speech from the Throne which promises to upgrade the status of French in the province.

The Confederation Conference was attended by about 60 students in MacDonald Hall. Workshop discussions followed the remarks from the panelists. The event was sponsored by the local PC Youth

Feds give $8 million to Queen's

Health and Welfare Minister Marc Lalonde last week announced that Queen's is to receive nearly $8.5 million dollars from the Federal Government towards the completion of the new Medical Sciences complex on Stuart Street. The money, drawn from the federal Health Resources Fund, will be used to fund the construction of the new centre for various components of the Faculty of Medicine and allied health services which are currently located in eight older buildings on Campus.

The new facilities will be used for the training of medical students, students in life science and biology, in nursing services, in rehabilitation medicine, in physical education, and for graduate students in the field of health.

Except for minimal expansion of medical research space, the new complex will not increase the training capacity of Queen's University in these disciplines. Once the new building is complete, the existing buildings will revert to other University uses.

The $8,223,000 grant has been matched by the provincial government. Thus bringing the total grant to well over $16 million. The Minister also announced that smaller grants had been made towards similar

The Prodigal Beaver

Beaver extorted for bottle of wine

by Rob Reynolds

I could not believe it, someone was on the telephone trying to convince me that his stuffed pet beaver was kidnapped. Despite my efforts to convince the alleged victim that the Journal did not publish on April 1 he persisted in relating to me his story of the snatched beaver.

The story was substantiated somewhat when the victim, Steve Anderson of Arts 78 read out the contents of the ransom note which imparted "If you ever want to see your furry friend again you must comply with my demands deliver one bottle of red wine (not London red) inside a green garbage bag, to the base of the basketball hoop closest to the center of Victoria Park this Thursday night."

The note was signed by "Carlos", although it is a matter of contention whether it was the international terrorist. Indeed, my first compulsion was not to telephone the RCMP intelligence branch to inform them that the terrorist was at large in Limestone City.

The last sentence of the ransom letter did, however, resemble

Carlos' style saying, "To refuse my BEAVER to a long and painful death!" Also the fact that the stuffed beaver's paw was enclosed with the message could have been evidence that the international conspiracy was at its netherous best (sic).

Anderson was quite anxious to get the beaver back as it was great sentimental value. An old Indian had bequeathed it to him at the end of his summer in the Yukon. Not being terribly indisposed towards

by Maben Smith

The expansion of facilities at Norman Rogers Airport is part of the City's attempt to generate growth in Eastern Ontario states a report issued recently by the Office of Kingston's Industrial Commissioner. The Commissioner noted that the development of an efficient airport is important in allowing for the expansion of the economic base of the community. The report is seen as an attempt to calm residents of the City alarmed over the recent expansion of the airport.

The aviation facilities have undergone a one-million dollar modernization. Included in this package is an extension to the main runway, new lighting installation, flight information services, and a non-directional beacon. Little maintenance work had been done at the airport since it was built -- as an Air Force training base during World War II.

The City has assumed full responsibility for the management and cost of providing the facilities. It was, however, entered into an agreement with Transport Canada to share costs in making improvements. It is estimated that as many as fifty people are employed at the airport, creating an annual payroll of $670,000. Aircraft movement is approximately 10,000 units per month, the third largest airport without control towers in Canada.

It is hoped that recent developments will increase charter service, improve connecting air services and provide facilities to accommodate corporate aircraft.

Wet Guelph

Guelph students spent an average of $15.65 per month on alcohol, 23 people in the sample spent in excess of $50. The study reports that in 1974-75 the average per capita expenditure in Ontario was $15 per month. Using the busiest nights and the most popular bar on campus, the Keg, in February 1976 when the survey was being conducted a total of $3,253 was spent on alcohol. The bar holds 350 people.

During the entire month of February, the bar took in a total of $64,087 from the sale of beer, liquor, wine, etc. There are seven regular licensed outlets on the Guelph campus, the University is also under a blanket license permitting alcohol at banquets and other events in many locations. The Keg sold a total of 62,451 gallons of beer in the calendar year 1976.

OFS meets with MPP's Lobbyists successful

by Michael Scott

Hugh Christie, President of the AMS, termed the recent Ontario Federation of Students' mass lobby at Queen's Park a "tremendous success" and a "real step forward" for the federation. In a recent interview with the Journal, Mr. Christie explained that approximately 90 representatives and supporters of the O.F.S. helped to "raise the profile of colleges and universities" in the eyes of Ontario's opposition parties.

The lobbyists made a concerted effort to speak with every M.P.P. Members of the O.F.S. executive met with the caucuses of both the Liberal and the N.D.P. parties and were successful in having questions pertaining to student affairs raised on the floor of the house.

Mr. Christie discussed the Liberal Party's interest in the extensive nature of O.F.S. research and was pleased that the Liberal Caucus intends to utilize O.F.S. research in preparing its forthcoming policy paper on colleges and universities. Mr. Christie expressed confidence that these newly-opened avenues of communication were most useful gains for the O.F.S.

Job Bank to go full-time

Job Bank, the job-finding service run by and for Queen's students starts full-time operation in the Polson Room May 2nd. Hours will be from 8:30 to 4:30.

Co-Directors Kathy Roeder and Dave Ross hope to improve on last year's total of over 1300 full and part-time jobs filled in the Kingston area. Last year ranged from gardening and painting to office work and camp-related jobs.

Most of the funding for this year's Job Bank will come from the AMS and the rest will be from the University Registrations are being taken until May 1st at the Career Planning and Placement Office in the St. Lawrence Building and thereafter in the Polson Room. The Directors are encouraging early registration so the program can start in full gear on May 2nd.

They're managing to put out the arts section despite the continual pressures exerted by temperamental contributors. Tom Shand who always dresses the part is still fighting with Fud and the Polo boys about cheap shots. Beth Moon will never have a cartoon, but Shelagh and Joni will always have features. Rob Reynolds, our singing revolutionary, is out fanning the home fires. Mary and Adrian really know what's happening and because of them the rest of us do too. The efficient World News department has gone home for an early 8:30 bedtime and Judith Endean is being poetic...you should hear her when the pop machine rips her off. And Rob is still fanning the tires. Annette, our unsung heroine is getting used to smoky back room bargaining and happily carries on the best tradition of Donut Liaison Officer. After laying out her page 80 times, Jennifer finally gives up and uses the Hurl-tem against the wind method. AND THEN THERE'S HOWARD K. What more can we say? Bernie is still looking for a partner in the Counter counter culture business.

Trish still can't believe how incredibly gross we are and Chris Hall promises to write only as much news as fits the page. Klaus and Betsy have again been kept busy flushing the smokers out of the Tricolor office.

Above all we pay tribute to the quiet people without whose typing and layout skills the paper would never get to press. A special thanks to Mr. Tim Horton who single-handedly brings the whole staff together at coffee time.

Alumni Teaching Award to A.R.C. Duncan

Professor A.R.C. Duncan of the Faculty of Arts and Science is the third recipient of the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. The Award was established in the fall of 1974 to recognize faculty members whose knowledge of their field of study and whose ability to motivate and impart that knowledge to students is clearly outstanding.

Professor Duncan will receive an award of $1000.00 plus a Certificate of Merit at Spring Convocation for the Faculty of Arts and Science, the morning of Saturday, 4 June, 1977. Professor Duncan will be presented to Chancellor Michener by E.G.A. Jorgensen, president of the Alumni Association of Queen's University.

A native of Scotland, Professor Duncan studied at the University of Edinburgh, graduating in 1936 with first class honours and an M.A. degree in philosophy. He spent the year 1936-37 at the University of Marburg, Germany, on an Exchange Scholarship. In 1938 he won the Ferguson Scholarship in philosophy in open competition with all four Scottish universities.

Professor Duncan began his teaching career in 1937 at the University of Edinburgh, and the following year he was a lecturer in philosophy at University College, University of London, England.

During the period 1939 to 1945 he was on active war service with the British Army, first as a regimental officer in the Royal Artillery with the rank of captain, then in Military Intelligence with the rank of general staff officer III when he served principally in the Middle East, Africa and Italy, and in the War Office.

Following the war, he taught at the University of Edinburgh from 1945 to 1949. He joined the staff of Queen's University at Kingston in the fall of 1949 as Head of the Department of philosophy, a post which he still holds. During the period 1959-1964, Professor Duncan served as Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Professor Duncan's chief interest is in the field of philosophical ethics. His training has been classical and he has full command of the French and German language, as well as a good understanding of Italian. He has been long recognized as one of the most stimulating teachers and lecturers on the staff of Queen's University.

Professor Duncan was chosen from among twenty excellent candidates nominated for the Award, by the Teaching Awards Committee under the chairmanship of Professor H.R.S. Ryan, who acted on behalf of the Vice-Principal Services, Dr. H.M. Love.

Beaver kidnapped

the story it took the wise words of the Editor to convince me to go to Victoria Park to see the human drama unfold. Words such as "Golly this is just awful. You should get your ass up there and find out about it He convinced me of the moral side of the dilemma."

Arriving at Victoria Park at 8:32 I found the green garbage bag with the bottle of vintage stock inside (Jordan Valley). As the citizenry tend to get mildly suspicious when then there is someone hiding behind a tree in the park after the sun has gone down I decided to leave. The time was 8:42.

When Anderson returned not 20 minutes later, the wine was gone. He had little to show for it as the beaver had not come home.

The mystery was solved on Saturday with a note from Carlos which read: "How could anyone dumb enough to read a ransom note incorrectly and send white wine (blah) instead of red? God you're stupid."

The note went on to tell Steve that his furry little friend was at the back of the house in a garbage can, appropriately enough in a green garbage bag. The kidnapper had obviously kept a vigilant watch on the basketball hoop as my presence was duly noted in a P.S. that read "Dick Tracy in the white pants, blue coat, and glasses sure blew this case!"

Carlos did mention in the letter that he was going to move on to somewhat bigger game stating "I'm moving on Washington to kidnap Jimmy Carter's grandmother. I might even get a bottle of Tequila for her!"

The important thing is that the man and his furry little friend are

As the school year draws to a finish, Campus Comment asked students to discuss what they felt to be the most positive and negative aspects of the year to date. Included in their statements were impressions of the cultural, political and social milieu of Queen's University.

Liz Hamilton

"Despite the fact that a majority of the people at this university come from relatively the same background, there is still a chance to meet people on an intellectual level that goes beyond class barriers." However, Liz (Arts '79) felt that such an intellectual stimulus was not to be found until later in one's university career; "...not until you finish your undergraduate years." She claimed that "at Queen's, there is probably more games playing than at any other university, and not as much individuality, but this is mainly because people find security in relating on a similar plane." She further explained that by not getting outside this plane "passivity results. I was discouraged until Germaine Greer came to speak. That was the first hint of anything controversial." In conclusion, Liz stated that "I've learned that you only find yourself when you lose yourself, and Queen's is a great place to lose yourself."

Warren Johnson

"This year I was more conscious than ever of what a closed community Queen's is." Warren (Arts '77) commented that the people who attend Queen's seem to come from one background. "Perhaps we would learn more by meeting people from different cultural backgrounds." "There was a lot going on in Kingston this year, more travelling companies at the Grand and film series." Warren did say that "the political acclamations of some of the positions on the AMS weren't really indicative of a low ebb of interest, but rather representative of what Queen's has been like during the past five years that he has been here

Michael Gilbert

"This year, I felt that Orientation Week was run much better. It had a more responsible attitude, and should be even better next year." Michael (Commerce '78) felt that Queen's students are "disillusioned because there is such a shortage of jobs", and as a result felt it would be better if there were more "practical and concrete issues presented in class." Politically, Michael was disappointed in the AMS elections "either people weren't interested, or they felt they weren't qualified." As well, he was disillusioned by the library situation "They are never open when you want them to be there have been no explanations made for dropping many important services." He concluded his statements by saying "I feel that the competition is higher this year...more people are concerned about the quality of their education."

Trish Crowe

"This year I got more involved than ever in the speakers and guests that came to Queen's...they were excellent." Trish (Arts '79) felt that the "concerts were of a fairly poor standard. Unfortunately, I didn't get out to many of the student-sponsored events." Politically, she felt there was a "general lack of involvement in AMS politics." Trish commented that the "new coffee shop was nice and bright, although the windows are cracking because the building is settling in." She objected to the fact that there were lineups at the new Pub. When asked what she considered to be her most serious objection to Queen's she replied, "I don't like the way Ron Watts combs his hair."

New Commissioners speak out

John Ryder-Burbridge

by Chris Hall

"There has been a lack of communication between the AMS and the student body at Queen's," says John Ryder-Burbridge, recently appointed AMS External Affairs Commissioner in an interview with the Journal. Ryder-Burbridge, a third year History major, perceives this lack of communication as being a major deterrent in the defeat of various referendums supporting NUS membership and opposition to differential fees for foreign students.

Ryder-Burbridge was previously president of the PC party at Queen's. However, he does not see this involvement as being a factor affecting his functions as commissioner. "I have no network of relationships with government officials in Ontario. I will approach issues pragmatically, not out of political affiliation. As External Affairs Commissioner, I represent the view points of this University, not just those of a member of the PC party."

Ryder-Burbridge also responded to a number of questions regarding OFS and the Ontario government's policy in regard to post-secondary education.

He emphasized that the Queen's delegation to OFS has always been a moderating influence trying to improve OFS credibility with the Ontario government. "OFS has made too many unrealistic proposals to the Ontario government, a habit which has led the government to claim that OFS does not necessarily represent the views of Canadian students. The Queen's delegation will try and change this image of the OFS from the inside."

Ryder-Burbridge was also critical of the recently handed down OLANG Report. While noting that OLANG recognizes tuition fees as a barrier to universal accessibility to post-secondary education and that present OSAP policy has definite shortcomings, he said, "OLANG has not based on any visible statistical reports. It was also basically a revamped OSAP program, for example, OLANG also based its student aid policy on parent's income, not the individual student's income."

communication has been strictly horizontal, that is, no communication has taken place between faculties and the different years within that faculty."

Ms. McInerney also expressed a desire to make minor revisions in the AMS Constitution. Her specific concern is with the running of elections. "There is nothing in the constitution about how to run an election. The recent election mishap was due to a misunderstanding on the part of the Chief Returning Officer as to the extent of his powers. This delineation of power must be set up in the Constitution."

Ms. McInerney also accepted a budget cut for the Internal Affairs Commission next year at the last AMS Outer Council meeting. The biggest cut was a $500 decrease in the Advertising budget. "After talking to the Journal and G.W., I decided I did not need $5,500 for advertising. This cut leaves the Internal Affairs budget at $11,800, the smallest amount of all the budgets for AMS commissions."

In closing, Ms. McInerney noted that she had a good number of applications for the different positions in her commission. She attributed this turnout to the advertising done which emphasized that great experience was not necessary, just a desire to become involved.

Cathy McInerney

Cathy McInerney, appointed Internal Affairs Commissioner for the 1977-1978 school year, outlined her major objectives as, "Creating a lot more communication on campus by means of the press, making myself more available to people, and creating an 'external' Internal Affairs Assistant Commissioner." The duties of this assistant commissioner will be, "To work with the AMS Researcher, the DSC's, and residence councils in an effort to improve communications between the various factions of the university."

These plans for better communication result from a situation which Ms. McInerney termed, "a lack of lateral communication. Com-

Mike MacMillan

"The education commission will conduct an ongoing analysis of the quality of education at Queen's, focusing on specific areas like the library, the bookstore, and admissions procedures," says Mike MacMillan, newly appointed AMS Education Commissioner in an interview with the Journal. "This aspect has been overlooked in the past and has not been done as effectively as possible." MacMillan, a third-year Film Studies major, has appointed a special committee to perform this analysis.

MacMillan also stated that the Education Commission will offer a program of events of an educational, interdisciplinary nature which are not covered in the classroom. "This program will include seminars, films, and other presentations."

The Education Commission's budget for next year was increased by approximately $3000. This increase was primarily due to a $1,500 allotment for Special Events and a $1,300 allotment to the Future Perspectives Convenor.

According to MacMillan, the Future Perspectives Program will present the other side of the coin to the Arts Festival. It will look into environmental issues, like population growth, food sources, and energy. There will also be a special week for Future Perspectives, which I feel will be the best thing to be done next year."

In reference to Special Events, MacMillan noted that there will be a Labor Symposium next year which will present the viewpoints of both management and union sides of labor-related problems. Money will be used to hold debates and publish pamphlets.

MacMillan also responded to questions concerning the latest referendum on differential fees for foreign students and NUS membership. "It is unfortunate that Queen's students decided not to join NUS. We can't afford not to be in it. The only way to make positive change in existing university problems is by providing input from the inside." MacMillan was even more adamant in his condemnation of Queen's students supporting differential fees. "I think it is a tragedy that support was given to this Ontario Government policy. Queen's students chose to shove their international students aside."

MacMillan disagreed with the proposition that Queen's students on the whole are too introspective. "It is dangerous to label Queen's students introspective across the board, however, in this case they acted in an introspective way."

Greg Doyle

Greg Doyle, the new Campus Activities Commissioner, stated in an interview with the Journal that one of his commission's main goals for the next school year will be to have, "Campus Activities and the Queen's Entertainment Agency work closely together to provide a wide range of good entertainment at Queen's." This co-operation is necessary as both groups are at the mercy of business managers.

Doyle also cited a number of other objectives for next year. "I plan to develop a new policy for showing films at Queen's. There will be one film a week per group. This will allow a group to show movies without pre-empting someone else and ensuring that there will be no repetition of films on campus."

Another plan being considered by Doyle is to move Winterworld into the second week back from Christmas break. "By moving Winterworld back we'll be able to develop better advertising which hopefully will mean a better turnout."

Doyle also expressed a desire to involve individual year societies again next year in Homecoming. The floats built by individual year societies for the Homecoming parade was deemed very successful this year.

Contrary to the satisfaction expressed by the other commissioners with the large number of applications received for positions in their commissions, Doyle stated that his turnout was not as good. "I had only one person apply for a number of positions. This is partly due to the fact that the Education and External Affairs Commissions have always been a popular thing. Campus Activities positions, because they require a lot of time and effort, tend to be less popular."

Warden for 3 years roasted last Saturday

They roasted the Warden of Leonard Hall last weekend.

Rob Buller, Arts '72, MBA '77 and Warden of the men's residence for the past three years was guest of honour at a banquet held last Saturday night in the Leonard Cafeteria.

Several Students, Floor Seniors, and Residence officials gave short testimonials and one group sang a song about Buller's shortcomings and idiosyncrasies at the banquet attended by 150 people.

Buller began his career at Queen's as an Arts Freshman in 1968. As an undergraduate and MBA student, he has sat on Senate Committees, was Speaker of the AMS Outer Council, was co-founder and first student manager of the Queen's Pub, was a Queen's cheerleader, CFRC announcer and Tricolor Award recipient, to name a few of his accomplishments.

Between 1972 and 74, Buller was the Queen's University High School Liaison Officer and he took over as Warden of Leonard Hall in 1974.

A congratulatory letter from Principal Watts read in part: "He has not only contributed to the University in a great variety of ways but with the same enthusiasm, energy and zip which can be derived only from his fascination for motor racing."

Buller was presented with a watercolor painting of the residence by F. Schoenburger and a large cartoon-canture by Terry Collins.

Said one student, "Uncle Bob" (a nickname given to him by a former co-worker at the Holiday Inn) "is one of the best Dons I've ever had, one of the best Wardens I've ever had and one of the best Warden's Leonard could ever expect."

Buller is leaving this year to accept a job with the Xerox Corporation in Ottawa.

Future shortage of oil not contrived by large oil companies - Daniel

by Jennifer Warren

Four years ago it was estimated that Canada was in the fortuitous position having a 392 year supply of oil and a several-hundred-year supply of natural gas. Today there is fear of an imminent energy crisis. An attempt to reconcile these seemingly contradictory positions was undertaken in a lecture last Wednesday evening, by the President of Shell Canada, Mr C.W. Daniel.

In response to suggestions that the apparent future shortage of oil, gas and other energy sources was contrived by the oil companies to boost prices, Mr. Daniel claimed that there would in fact be a shortage, if nothing changed, stating that the earlier optimistic estimate did not distinguish between 'potential' and 'proven' reserves of oil.

The research and development of the potential sources, such as the tar sands and the Arctic Islands and other frontier operations has not been as successful as hoped, the speaker admitted, as the sands are proving to be economically too costly, the exploration on the frontier has turned up few reserves.

When this less-hopeful view of the potential of oil reserves is coupled with the financial and environmental constraints or energy expansion; the difficulties the nuclear option is facing, and the diminishing rate of cheap hydro development, Mr. Daniel envisages an energy crisis by the mid 1980's. He mused that although the quadrupling of oil prices by OPEC had aggravated the grim energy forecast, the "Middle East countries did the world a favour" by making it economically necessary to begin seeking out new oil and gas reserves, as well as to experiment with alternative energy sources, before the actual 'crunch'.

The Shell President predicted that despite possible alternative energy sources, oil and gas will for a considerable time remain of predominant importance. Even with tremendous success in the nuclear field, by 1985 it would still only satisfy 5 per cent of the country's energy needs. Thus new Canadian oil and gas supplies, as well as the development of new sources are critical, he stated.

It was claimed that despite the crucial need for increased investment, research and development in the energy industry, the rate of return on invested capital is relatively low, resulting in the increased difficulty to meet the requirement for expansion and research. Mr. Daniel foresaw a change in lifestyle patterns due to the impending energy limitations, and added that this may not be such a painful or bad change, quoting the example that the United States uses four times as much energy as is used in all of China, on air-conditioning alone.

A Dominican Republic thank you

Queen's helps with hospitals labs

The rector of a Dominican Republic university was in Kingston last week to personally thank Queen's University for outstanding contributions of "time and effort" toward the establishment of health care laboratory facilities in his country and to explore closer ties with Queen's in other disciplines.

Dr. J.T. Mejia of the Universidad Nacional Pedro Henriquez Ureña (UNPHU) in Santo Domingo met with Principal Donald L. Watts and representatives of the Faculties of Arts and Science, Medicine and Applied Science to discuss how the Dominican university could best benefit from a broader association with Queen's and vice versa. Dr. Mejia showed special interest in chemistry, physics, engineering, humanities and continuing education.

Dr. H.G. Kelly, vice-principal of health sciences and a key figure in the health care project, said that an expanded educational relationship with UNPHU, now in the formative stages, could eventually lead to an exchange of students and staff.

Queen's medical connection with UNPHU began in 1970. Today there is a Biomedical Institute in Santo Domingo and a modern laboratory which provides support services for the majority of the country's hospitals and clinics. The efficiency and success of the institute's services have sparked plans for a community health centre. Queen's contribution to this co-operative project has been one of guidance and advice. Administration of project funds and the ordering of laboratory equipment were handled here at Queen's. Members of Queen's Faculty of Medicine were heavily involved in planning and directing the project. In particular, Dr. Sergio Bencosme of the department of pathology spent 1973, his sabbatical year, in the Santo Domingo overseeing the construction of the institute and the training of personnel. Several staff members at the institute have come to Queen's for specializing training.

The clear results of the project are: an improved quality of service to hospitals, clinics and patients; an upgrading of scientific and professional standards and more Dominican physicians electing to practise in their own country.

The project is now self-supporting. However initial financing was threefold: Canadian government support through CIDA, contributions from Canadian industry which have interests in the Dominican Republic and support from the Dominican Republic Government and UNPHU.

Queen's Journal

editorial opinion

Just one more thing:

The last edition of the year. In it are stories about the AMS Court, a body which has never been so active as it has been in the last few weeks, one on a Confederation seminar which took place last Saturday (it was most disturbing to hear Sunday night that more than a third of Quebecers now favour separatism given that an economic union with the rest of Canada can be arranged. I'm not sure the world news people got that in and an excellent feature reprinted from the Globe, in case you missed it, on the economy of Canada. This last item is an article we would urge you to read - the Canadian economy will shortly be the greatest problem facing all Canadians.

There are many people on staff who deserve special credit for their dedication in producing this paper all year and for logging the hundreds of hours required:

Giles Gherson, News editor, has made an outstanding contribution to the Journal's content in the form of editorials, feature length interviews, and news stories and has coordinated and edited the most difficult section of the paper with great skill and humour.

Business manager Cindi Hall has put up with a temperamental editor given to three hour planning horizons and an amazing ability to keep things to himself. She has executed her job with greater financial acumen and technical expertise than any of her eight most recent predecessors (this according to our printer-in-residence John Morris of Prescott).

Gerry Lewarne and Jim Klein split the responsibilities for editing the opinion section this year. It has been a great comfort to know that Howard Smith won't land us a libel suit.

Barb Boucher has spent great chunks of time co-ordinating the layout and typing work required every pressnight, which is no mean task when you consider that more than 115 people have participated on the Journal this year and that at any time on a press night a good proportion of these contributors may be in attendance causing havoc.

Liz Wood and Eric Hughes have produced what may be the finest Arts section of any college paper in Canada right now.

Tom Shand from Calgary, who wrote the bizarre little story on page 31, is stepping down as Sports editor this year after years of participation in that section. His efforts have been greatly appreciated.

Shelagh Hurley and Joni Blisshen edited and laid out all the features while Fred Van Driel and Ron McCarthy pattered about in the darkroom for hours developing and printing photographs subject to last-minute layout changes and consequent remakes.

And a great many more. Mary Elmsley and Adrien Mann split the What's Happening duties; Allison Haggarty, Celia Ross and Ken Brunner synthesized the Globe and Mail and Whig Standards all year to keep Leonard Field in touch with civilization; Beth Moon and newcomer Josh Beaumont drew cartoons at the whim of a dozen editors while Rob Reynolds wrote his stories in the back offices and entertained us with songs about the Revolution.

The greatest thanks should go to all the people who, with no more credit than a weekly appearance in the masthead, came down each pressnight to bang away on typewriters and to think up headlines. To these people the Journal owes a great debt.

To the columnists, reporters, photographers, reviewers and editors far too numerous to name, my sincere thanks for your efforts in making this one of the finest college papers in the country and for producing one of the best volumes of the Queen's Journal in our 104 year history.

To the heir apparents of this mess I extend my best wishes. Jude Byrne and Mike Scott are well equipped for the position: they've been practicing their evening goodnight and thank yous for months.

My personal memory of Queen's will be the greatest collection of conservative people north of Pennsylvania. It is an isolated, quiet, distinguished and proud institution which I hope will always attract good students. Complacent students they may be but students who generally are thinking clearly and with a good measure of common sense.

By comparison to other Universities, Queen's is almost too quiet. Complacency is fine in moderation; I only hope that Queen's has taught us to care.

Cheers.

Parting shots — by Howard Smith
"Come in Queen's: this never-never land"

by Howard Smith
A colleague of mine was heard to say "Earth to Queen's - Earth to Queen's - come in Queen's." His metaphor aptly describes the public conception of Queen's University.

Ah yes, Queen's - the never-never land of Ontario's, if not Canada's, elite puppets. It is here we pass the world by in a flurry of oil thighs, Queen's jackets, football games and "six buck a throw" concerts. We are the 1958 of 1977, the "ivy league" of Canadian Schools.

Just how "Ivory tower" we really are is upon our own heads. Given that we're caught up in the "Piccolo Mondo" theory of university, then we in all deserve our reputation. This place is not however a remote island, it is every bit as much the real world as what you go to upon graduation - only the games are changed.

"The real world's on the outside" theory, so vouchingly bantered about by academia, is a dangerous myth. In it we find solace for our ineptitude, our apathy and our tunnel vision; in it we find a pardon for talents left fallow and potential left unexplored.

So look around you Queen's. Don't insist upon living from one concert to the next, in looking to the books but not outside them, in hearing the lectures but not yourselves, else you may transform a convenient myth to a self-fulfilling prophecy. Worse yet you may transform your real identity to that of a spectator in your own life, a passerby in your own profession.

Five hundred dollars and a broken promise

by Glen Farley and Trish Crowe

A graduate student learned that a certain landlord had just purchased a house on William Street. Upon inquiring, he was told that the house had already been "promised" to another group of students. The student then offered the landlord $500 cash for the opportunity to sign a lease for accommodation that, in some cases, they had never seen. The landlord also stated "that eventually one day, I will control most of the rental units in this town..."

A group of students answered an ad that offered the third and fourth floors of a house as a 4 or 5 person house. They signed a lease paid $513 a month for rent. When it came time to find subletters for this summer, the landlord turned down 4 groups presented by the permanent tenants. The fifth group the landlord accepted and asked for a $500 deposit. At the same time he accepted another group and their $500 deposit. He then phoned the first group and told them they could sublet and renew in September if they agreed to pay $600 a month to him for the summer. The students refused and demanded their deposit back.

Numerous students have been denied leases for a variety of reasons. Some refused to sign statements agreeing not to report or contest rent increases in excess of 8 percent or refused to pay "extra charges". Others were first in line for houses but were refused because they were male or in certain faculties or even in one case because the landlord thought they were "teeny-boppers" and "not his type".

Three students in separate incidents were given appointments with landlords to sign leases but were phoned hours before and told that other students had received the leases first.

The information contained in this column was obtained through nine weeks of interviews conducted by the HOUSING FORUM staff.

The Journal has the names of the landlords and tenants involved in these incidents and although a lack of time and an excess of vested interests has made the complete investigation of these allegations impossible at this time, they will be published as soon as the necessary inquiries can be made.

'Separatist CBC' charge is dangerous

by Bernie Helling

With the imminent yet unannounced federal election, the liberal cabinet has proved its utter lack of scruples by criticizing the French arm of the CBC of a separatist bias.

Separatism has become the two-thirds national villain, the one-third uncertainty, and the 100 percent issue next election. God help us, Joe Clark sure as all hell can't. Across the border, they once had a politician they dubbed "the trickster", surely we must consider this title for Canadian use. Our imperial Prime Minister has sat around for nine years and we are still in a (Water?) hole.

Our economy is a mess, we are regionally divided, our taxes and the government are too damn big, our industry isn't competitive, etc ad nauseum. In short we have been mismanaged with a dedication seldom seen except in religious fanatics.

We will forget all logic or reason, we will forget what the country has been through and we will all turn into mass-minds and flock around the throne of Pierre, Messiah, salvation of Canada, defender of federalism, and scourge of certain hunched-over, chain-smoking Frenchmen. Hallelujah, here comes another run of wage controls, inflation, unemployment, higher taxes, etc, etc. And they say we get the government we deserve!

The fault doesn't only lie at the foot of the cabinet, at the foot of Mr. Trudeau, or at the feet of the Liberals. Sure as all hell, Joe Clark and the Tories should be scolded for providing us with "a deep blue sea" which we can jump into to avoid the devilish grits. We really have no choice. The public is being told that only Pierre can save Canada, the issues are already on a personnel level and "Joe Who" has about as much personality as a brick. He might be as vague on the issues as Carter was but he can't even smile! Like it or not, this election will run on a gut level and Clark has the charisma of "Mr. Whipple".

As for the NDP well hell, yawn! snore, snore. I might even vote for them. Seriously, I'd consider a "None-of-the-Above" vote!

What really burns me up is the way the wool has and will be pulled over the public's eyes. All the sincere loathing of the liberals has melted, and all logical abhorrences have faded before the great bugaboo of separatism.

A commission is now holding an inquiry into this charge and already they have found one significant fact. There has been no public outcry against this "bias" before or after the cabinet allegations! Apparently the bias is a figment of a scared liberal imagination. It matters little, the damage is done.

The CBC is already the "party line" of Canada (or the federal liberals) as close observation of their lopsided coverage on critical events has proved time and time again. Picket lines are only filmed when full of "long-haired freaky types", dissenting voices are given little chance to speak. Opposition politicians are grilled with leading questions as the CBC reporter sits quietly and smiles while a liberal pontificates on whatever he sees fit. The rest of the time we are fed pre-digested goo! Do you honestly care what Maggy is doing with Mick Jagger?

sitting on top? You get the CBC, and you're stuck with it.

But this charge of separatism holds darker implications. Can Ottawa dictate to a purported "free press" what it wants to hear, or wants us to hear? Will it bring in royal commissions every time it is badmouthed for its ineptitude?

Self censorship is far worse than imposed censorship. One begins to wonder what we don't hear about I can remember at least one interesting piece of news that was never followed up on. Using the media for such a cheap electioneering shot should not go unpunished. The media has dethroned demagogues before. I think it's time again.

Oh, for a few more days in the sun before the deadlines get the better of us all.

"I CRAMMED SO MUCH FOR THIS EXAM I GOT CONSTIPATION!"

Pointless memorizing or "Training of the Mind"?

by Jim Pierson

Here I sit writing a letter to the Queen's Journal when I should be cramming precious little gems of intellectual diarrhea into my cranium.

How many of you people go winging into the exam hall with myriads of little facts and formulae crammed in upstairs so tight that your head feels like a pressure vessel? Yes, exams are really here. I'm so happy I could defecate (quaint?).

I am questioning the values of spilling your brains out on an exam paper on one day, and being a grinning idiot on the subject an hour, month or maybe even a year later. My point is bucking our "time-tested and proven" method of classical examination that is so fervently upheld by some professors. My point is, why can we not come a little out of far left field and establish a more accurate test of one's comprehension in a given field? Is there justice in being downgraded on an exam when we can't recall an equation that could choke a yak? The classical reply to my plea for formulae and data is that pointless memorizing is "Training of the Mind". Garbage. It increases the entropy of the universe and it will all end more quickly.

If our instructors are attempting to generate a wave of brilliant engineers or otherwise, they are failing miserably. In a working environment, a goal is achieved through thorough comprehension of a problem, intellectual interaction with others, and having enough meat between the ears to know where you'll find what you need, and be able to use it.

One suggestion might be that professors and instructors stop and reassess what their function actually is instead of devoutly forging ahead, seemingly obliviously to the requirements of the real working world. Examinations can be designed to test comprehension rather than memorizing ability. An unwillingness to consider my point suggests that some instructors may not be able to pit themselves against their own students in a test of subject comprehension or perhaps they rely on "hand waving" as a cover for incompetency.

Some faculties are realizing and have acted on the problem. Here, however, many still maintain their Victorian views and simultaneously rave about the necessity of change in our society.

I think I've made my points; now people can say, "Why Pierson, I didn't know that you weren't a writer."

Banner - hangers offer no apologies, T shirt instead

Dear Editor:

It is unfortunate that Ms. Grimes has such a Victorian outlook on life at Queen's that she can take so great an insult to such things as Golden Words and more recently to the flag on Ontario Hall. It is true that the anatomical representation in the flag might have shocked many peoples values but it was hung for this affect, as a prank. Despite Michael McMillan's great hopes Queen's is to a large extent a closed environment, with most people's horizon's limited to their studies. Actions such as ours are not physically destructive (people offended could merely look the other way), and they add life and vitality to one's stay at Queen's.

We took down the flag on our own accord, because of a request by the Civil department, not because of a demand by Hugh Christie.

This letter is in no way an apology Ms. Grimes might go to a Ugandan University where such activities are a

The 'fairy tales' of capitalist economics

Dear Editor:

This letter is in response to an anonymous letter in last week's Journal attack of Henry Laycock's feature 'Thinking about Marx'. The writer by his/her quick assessment and acceptance of capitalism clearly showed his/her competence in politics and philosophy is only matched by his/her pathetically inept economic arguments regarding capitalism. I do not wish to argue ideologies in this paper but merely to point to some economic features of the free capitalist system that Mr. Ms. Anon may have overlooked.

Let us not talk of fairy tales. Adam Smith's model of capitalism is a lovely story with Prince Handsome Profit marrying Princess Price and the world lived happily ever after, but the real world is a little different. In fact, it is so different that I am astounded that after 200 years of this utopia suffering dismal failure, someone is able to reiterate its precepts without a severe case of ego breakdown. Will he next defend Plato's Republic when someone criticizes the society of ancient Greece?

What is the record then, of this noble thing Capitalism? In fact it has never been a pure free enterprise system and never can be. There are two good reasons for this. First, capitalism can not function without the intervention of the state. The state intervenes partly for legitimization purposes (education, health, unemployment benefits, etc.)

So let us not try and put Adam Smith through the eye of a needle. Let us accept the realities of modern capitalism, the important role of multinationals, the state, imperialism, inflation and unemployment and then we have a debate - however big the differences of opinion. Harking back to a non-existent past only holds us back, and we may just as well count the angels on the tip of a pin or foam at the mouth and fall over backwards.

Nevertheless, the letter could serve a progressive function (especially now that the Journal has been so revitalized.) If it were to start off a debate on the nature of advanced capitalism, in particular the nature and origins of the present crisis. It is unfortunately the end of term now, but Queen's could certainly benefit from such a debate were it to be revived next term.

bit more "restricted." (Also, maybe the women there are as ashamed of their bodies as she seems to be.) To help Ms. Grimes examine her Puritanical values (which might not necessarily be wrong, but which at University should at least be questioned) Civil '79 would like to present her with a T-shirt of the same design as the flag-Truss me.

Nurses thank camp contributors

Dear Editor:

As a representative of the Nursing Society, I have been involved in a fund raising project. The purpose is to send a child from Ongwanada Children's Unit to a special camp for two weeks. The cost per child is $350. I am happy to say that as of today, $683 has been donated. Individual donations amounted to $213, $200 of which was collected in the residences by a small group from Chown. Several faculty societies have donated generously. (Other societies have not yet responded.) I wish to thank all of those who have contributed and will contribute to this worthy cause.

Developing the North

A Dene dilemma

by G. Levine

"Our plea to the world is to help us in our struggle to find a place in the world community where we can exercise our right of self-determination as a distinct people and as a nation."

What we seek then is independence and self-determination within the country of Canada. This is what we mean when we call for a just land settlement for the Dene Nation."

-Dene Declaration, July, 1975
"The Dene have the right to recognition, self-determination, and ongoing growth as a People and as a Nation."

-Dene Agreement, October, 1976
The Dene, that is, the Dogribs, the Loucheux, the Slaves, and the Chipewyans of the North West Territories have spoken out and are continuing to speak out against northern development which is not in their interest. Northern developments such as the Mackenzie Valley Pipeline have often been proclaimed as great saviours of the Canadian nation but it is becoming increasingly clear that these solutions to the country's ills are fraught with difficulties. Whose problems will such developments removing them (the real reasons are less palatable), and the Government only maintained the myth of anti-trust laws in order to uphold the Adam 'fairy tale' with Smith ideology that makes capitalism seem so pleasant (and that gives monopolies an easier time of it also.)

So let us not try and put Adam Smith through the eye of a needle. Let us accept the realities of modern capitalism, the important role of multinationals, the state, imperialism, inflation and unemployment and then we have a debate - however big the differences of opinion. Harking back to a non-existent past only holds us back, and we may just as well count the angels on the tip of a pin or foam at the mouth and fall over backwards.

Nevertheless, the letter could serve a progressive function (especially now that the Journal has been so revitalized.) If it were to start off a debate on the nature of advanced capitalism, in particular the nature and origins of the present crisis. It is unfortunately the end of term now, but Queen's could certainly benefit from such a debate were it to be revived next term.

What is happening in Northern Canada? It is apparent, as Davis and Zannis stated in The Genocide Machine in Canada, that a form of genocide is being committed. Genocide really has two phases; the destruction of the national life of the oppressed and the imposition of the national life of the oppressor. The native peoples of northern Canada are the victims of colonialism - a colonialism which is systematic and methodical. Colonialism by its nature, that is, its attempts to assimilate and to enforce dependency, must destroy the socio-economic-cultural system and often the people themselves.

The first system of colonial control which exploited the Dene was the fur trade. This trade although it was not as devastating as what was to follow, introduced the first signs of dependency and assimilation. The development of the non-renewable resource sector in more recent times has led to increased suppression of the Dene under corporate or neo-colonialism.

What has colonialism meant for the Dene? It has meant the imposition, by a colonial government primarily concerned with corporate interests, of policies and institutions which seek to destroy the Dene way of life. Oftentimes, in the past lack of medical care has led to high infant mortality. Further, the education system reinforced elements of Canadian colonialism, for example, white racism, elitism, the capitalist ethic, etc. Political institutions alien

"Trouble with you people is you never knew how to use the land." - AKWESASNE NOTES cartoon by Medicine Story to the Dene have been forced on that people and are useless in their quest to achieve their aims. This relates also to the burgeoning colonial bureaucracy in the Northwest Territories which stifles Dene initiative and also attempts to coopt some native peoples and create a colonial elite thus dividing the northern peoples. Finally corporate colonial exploitation of mineral resources makes it difficult for the Dene to continue their traditional economic activities because of the environmental impact of such industry, the influx of settlers, and the forcing of Dene into permanent settlements.

This destruction of the Dene way of life must stop. The Dene have demanded political and economic control in their land. They must be supported in this struggle against corporate colonialism. All Canadians must demand and end to government development schemes which serve only the interest of corporations and which will destroy the Dene.

The milk of human kindness

Dear Editor:

Usually I'm a modest, quiet person who rarely if ever uses such a public forum to express such opinions as follows, but I found out how generous and kind I am and was so amazed that I thought more people should share this experience and find these qualities in themselves too.

At a party on Friday, March 18, I didn't see the poor, ill-clad urchin shivering in the night. In a fit of kindness, he took my jacket from by the front door and wrapped it about himself so as to be protected from the cold and snow. The poor thing really would have tugged at my heartstrings, standing there wobbling drunkenly and unbelieving of his good fortune. He obviously liked the blue leather jacket with its nice good letters on the back. Seeing how pleased he was, but that his hands were shaking and he was thirsty, I had put my gloves and my chequebook into the inside pocket so that he could keep warm and have a little money too. I danced a few more songs, my heart gladdened by the thought that someone more needy than I was wearing my new jacket.

What a pleasant surprise when I went to leave, finding that the poor urchin had returned and left my keycase by the door. My faith in human nature restored, I timidly asked a friend for a ride home, as now I am a poor, ill-clad urchin and looking for the bastard that ripped me off.

But man is his own worst enemy when he defies himself or his system, and it is easier to do than we think. The systems we have created have made our fast-paced life one in which the means are more important than the ends, with no other purpose other than to keep the giant clock wound and ticking. Our society is one of rapid change, a blurred succession of ideas and inventions which skim over the surface of time far too quickly for any one idea to take root and become an enduring part of our reason for living, although social and sexual revolutions fill the vacuum from time to time, often causing more problems than they solve.

At this time of year it is nice to consider what it would be like if religious values captured the imagination of society and took root. It is hard to say. Perhaps it would make society more of a community, ending the sort of isolation which, to quote a minor example, causes some engineering students to believe, half-seriously, that a B.A. is useless simply because he has been told that in the year of our Lord, 1977, science is more justified than art, thought is more important than feeling.

I am aware that nowadays religion has little or nothing to do with direction society takes. But just as science and politics are monuments to man's compassion and self-sacrifice. Perhaps religion prevents us from losing sight of these qualities while we are dazzled by our own creations. Perhaps religion could create a society in which things like Viet Nam, Auschwitz, The Inquisition, and the first Easter could never happen again. It is hard to say. Sometimes this is just an idle, philosophic glimmering. Other times it is, like Easter, a matter of life and death.

Peripheral Visions — by David Gay

Thoughts on Easter

By David Gay

From time to time this year, students at Queen's have considered the value of religion in a society such as ours. The debate was initiated last fall when an article appeared in the Journal entitled "God isn't dead, He never lived". Needless to say it had been written by our resident Guru Howard Smith. Although at the time I disagreed with him, I was glad it appeared; it encouraged open discussion of the subject amongst students, although it did not cause quite as much discussion as Howard's article on sex.

It is easy to criticize corruption in the church history because corruption is cast in bold relief when measured against the inspired ideals of the Church. But in the secularized world, we have devised substitute plans for fulfillment which are more easily, and dangerously, corrupted.

The political systems men have created offer ideal societies of Utopias but the potential catastrophes of a Nixon or Stalin or another Viet Nam are nearly impossible to predict.

The technology which pervades these societies is another of man's blueprints for deliverance, upon which we have grown accustomed to place our hopes for fulfillment. No other generation has enjoyed the quality of life that we do, but though science has made us more comfortable, it has not always made us more content. This is because a technological society often channels and isolates people, placing them somewhere in a bureaucracy after centrifuging out their moral and religious viewpoint first, of course. After all, such things are best left to the privacy of the individual's conscience aren't they?

But Pascal found no difficulty in becoming a Christian even though he was one of the great scientific minds of his age. This is because he decided that science is limited, that nothing ultimate concerning the nature of life can possibly be concluded by empirical methods. Nevertheless, ours is a generation dazzled by the miracles of science. One result of this is that people who dismiss the doctrine of incarnation as being ludicrously unscientific find no trouble in reversing this doctrine, making men into Gods. This is evident in abortion on demand, genetic engineering, and other convenient blessings that have been dispersed amongst us.

"Bravo!" say past editors

Dear Editor:
Regarding "Withdrawal from C.U.P.", Bravo! C.U.P. is no longer a worthwhile, useful organization. Queen's helped to found it many years ago, and now is moving to improve it. Only by withholding the thousands of dollars Queen's has been asked to contribute next year will C.U.P. realize that its shoddiness and disorganization is intolerable. Some other C.U.P. members have pulled out also, and more no doubt will follow. In a few years, Queen's and others may want to found a simple and efficient news service, all that C.U.P. provided originally and all that is needed now.

CUP books need audit

Dear Editor:
I appreciate your concern over the nature of the news collection and editing as practiced by the Canadian University Press (CUP) and I agree with your withdrawal from that organization, due to the reasons as expressed in your letter of March 28, 1977. It is unfortunate that a founding member has decided to withdraw from its organization, but I feel that this move is completely justified. Both the attempts by the Journal to alter the disagreeable nature of CUP and the resolve displayed in finally leaving the organization after repeated failure are commendable. One point that you should perhaps have mentioned in your letter is the question of an audited financial statement. As I understand that CUP is incorporated, I presume in Ontario, an audited financial statement is required every fiscal year, as per the Corporations Act of Ontario. Failure to meet this requirement can result in legal action being taken against CUP, a point which should have been reiterated to the other members of the organization.

Christie: 'dishonest Advocate' shouldn't reflect on parent NUS

Dear Editor:
The front page picture in the March issue of the National Union of Students Student Advocate represents everything that student organizations should be moving away from. The picture is of a Vietnam War protest and has been retouched to give the impression that it is a Canadian anti-tuition increase rally. The inclusion of the picture in the paper is not only journalistically unethical, it is quite simply dishonest. The papers are being sent back to NUS and our extreme annoyance and displeasure have been registered.

In talking with the editor of the paper, it came out that there had been pictures of rallies at Windsor and UBC slated to go on the front page, and when they didn't arrive in time from these campuses he decided to put in the retouched picture. Which this was obviously an example of editorial indiscretion, it is not the subversive propaganda some have termed it. Even so, it is amazing to me that the editor could print something that will so seriously damage the credibility of students across the country, to say nothing of the image of the National Union of Students.

Where does this leave us at Queen's? By referendum decision Queen's decided not to join NUS last week, so the most that we can do is voice our disapproval of the act and as strong as that voice may be, it will necessarily be weaker than that of a

Trent paper:

Keep your principles in the CUP

To the Editors and staff:
It has recently come to our attention that your membership to Canadian University Press is "under protest". Even more distressing to us is the knowledge that you intend reconsidering your membership in the near future. The Arthur staff urge you not to take such drastic action at this time.

We share many of your reservations and criticisms of CUP. In this we include the unnecessary rhetoric contained in the Statement of Purposes for the News Service. We also find the News Service itself to contain unwarranted bias and, even worse, to be by and large badly written. We have serious reservations about the ill-considered expansion CUP has been railroaded into. To us it appears no improvements in terms of objective news analysis can result, quantity is no substitute for quality. Finally we object to the approved 70 percent increase in CUP fees, which will add increased strain onto our already overburdened budget.

But we urge you not to take as drastic a step as leaving CUP. We feel such action would result in a great loss to the membership. At a time when student newspapers should be reflecting the increasingly conservative mood on campuses, many CUP member papers run the risk of losing touch with those students. We should sincerely regret the loss of one of the few member papers which places a priority on accurate news and objective reporting. And although we are aware that the membership as a whole has tended to ignore the views of the few representative and autonomous papers, such as the Queen's Journal, we hope this will not always be the case.

In short, although we don't necessarily agree with your editorial policy we applaud your principled stand on certain issues. There being a sad lack of principle in CUP at present, your paper's withdrawal would represent a substantial loss, to us, and to the membership as a whole.

Canadian economy in need of shock treatment

Reprinted with permission, The Globe and Mail, Toronto

by Richard S. Malone

Canadians have been shielded too long from reality with welfare benefits and sugar-coated explanations to recognize that economically they are headed to a major financial crisis and a bust as far as export trade is concerned.

We have been too preoccupied by issues such as "Joe who", Rene Levesque's nation-building and bilingual air control, to realize the real threat to the nation is still inflation.

Either we must recognize this painful threat now or resign ourselves to learning the hard way, with a giant recession and massive unemployment. Anyone with an ounce of common sense must realize that this is the price we will surely pay unless we stop spending more than we produce and pricing ourselves completely out of world markets...and our workers out of jobs, with our high wages and mountainous debts.

We can no longer afford to ignore indefinitely the need for self discipline and some restraint in our demands. The basic laws of economics have not been repealed for Canada's benefit.

Amid heavy pressure on the Government for more spending, more protection, more welfare, more borrowing, tax cuts and an end to AIB controls, Ottawa plans to bring down a new budget at the end of the month. It is forecast that the main thrust will be to "restore public confidence in our economy".

With the present nation-wide discontent and cynicism, it is just possible that instead of pretty pictures in the budget, a shock treatment would be the best way to restore the nation's confidence, telling the public frankly for a change what a hell of a mess we are facing as a result of personal greed and weak politicians.

Conceivable public confidence might be better restored with the knowledge that at long last the Government is facing facts and not ducking issues to buy short-term popularity.

For some years past, whenever private individuals and associations have attempted to bring out unpleasant facts they have been discounted by Ottawa as gloomy Cassandras and charged with harming our economic recovery, trying to destroy the nation's confidence. Warnings of such economists as Harry Johnson, Judith Maxwell, Prof. Thomas Courchene, Robert McIntosh, John Crispo and many others have been totally ignored, but the facts are inescapable.

- Canada is now running the largest foreign debt in the Western World.

- Our average wages in manufacturing are now the highest in the world and our exports are dropping.

- We hold the world's record for hours lost per thousand workers due to labor disputes and strikes, losing five times as many man-days per thousand workers as Britain.

- Average wages in Canada last year increased by 14 per cent nearly double the rates in the United States.

- Since 1972 our labor cost per unit of output has increased more than 50 per cent compared to only 20 per cent in the United States and our productivity also suffers in comparison (see charts).

- Our trade deficit on manufacturing last year was $10 billion.

- Our money supply (M1), a chief cause of inflation, was up 22.8 per cent of the annual rate last month.

All in all, it is an appalling record and constitutes a far greater threat than separatism. The truth is we haven't the time nor can we afford the luxury of internal squabbles about separatism till we halt inflation. Only with an economically strong Canada can we hope to maintain national unity. We cannot afford to turn a blind eye to this any longer. We have no reason to feel smug about countries like Britain or Italy.

The real message of inflation seems to have at last reached both the British and U.S. governments. Prime Minister James Callaghan, speaking recently about Britain, is quoted as saying:

"We used to think that you could spend your way out of a recession and increase employment by cutting taxes and boosting Government spending. I tell you in all candor that that option no longer exists and in so far as it ever did exist it only worked by injecting bigger doses of inflation into the economy, followed by higher levels of unemployment as the next step. That is the history of the past 20 years." Labor agrees.

It is apparent that British labor has also started to realize higher wages can only mean higher inflation and fewer jobs, as evidenced by the fact that the unions in England have voluntarily accepted two rounds of a national pay policy.

With the U.S. record, of pay increases averaging about half the rate in Canada (without controls), it appears that top labor leaders like George Meany, as well as the Government have grasped the fact that more inflation means fewer jobs. In the opinion of former U.S. Secretary of the Treasury George Shultz, senior labor executives in the United States now fully understand, though it may not have sifted down to all echelons yet, that capital accumulation, investment and reasonable profit levels are the only real weapons against unemployment.

There is still no sign however, that these messages have reached either Ottawa or Canadian labor circles. In fact, for them wisdom seems to have simply taken the wings of the morning and left us all, young and old alike, bewildered, without purpose or direction and wondering what has suddenly happened to the Canada we knew only a few years ago.

We ask where is Canada's former reputation, once accepted from coast to coast, as being a responsible, hardworking, and law-abiding country. Inflation has indeed exacted a heavy toll, far beyond simple monetary terms.

Commenting recently in Blackwoods magazine about current economies, Sir John Glubb states, "gradually and almost imperceptibly the age of affluence silences the voice of duty. Greed for money is gradually replacing duty, honor and public service."

Perhaps our greatest deterrent to growth and recovery in Canada lies in our troubled labor-management arena, where endless pressures and struggles among personal ambitions, greed for power, productivity, earnings, equity, avarice, government regulations, conflicting jurisdictions and job security bombard each other endlessly to create explosive situations and loss of business.

The money illusion remains strong, whereas the real concerns should be the value of the money, the rates of taxation, profits and job security.

In the current atmosphere of total lunacy, the NDP's Ed Broadbent and many theorists from the ranks of both labor and management clamor for an end to AIB controls. The great question of the day is when will controls end. The answer of course is they should be ended as soon as possible.

Unfortunately, that is not the important question which first has to be answered, which is how do we end controls, when all the existing points to an immediate wage explosion (many excessive increases already committed in contract form) for above present limits?

In practical terms it is quite impossible to end controls until Ottawa sells the message that the game is now over: the day of wage increases double those in the United States has long passed, unless we make a final trip to the hock shop.

Controls, as repeatedly stressed, do not in themselves cure inflation. They can only give a pause and allow some breathing time to get things back on the rails again. But a year and a half has now lapsed and the breathing spell has been entirely wasted by the Trudeau Government.

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau has issued cautions about expectations but there has been no consistent or serious effort to present the hard picture, put the Governments overspending or inflated wage policies in order. Instead our Government and civil servants have selfishly protected themselves with indexing. There has been no convincing campaign launched to educate the nation or underline the fact that controls cannot be lifted until there is clear evidence that both management and labor will exercise some self discipline and restraint in either the national or their own individual interests.

All of this, of course, has been said a dozen times but it must be recognized that the politician, faced with the problem of winning popularity and clinging to office, views matters in different terms than an economist, union boss or corporate manager. He instinctively looks for the compromise the easy way out and the course which temporarily pleases the majority. In this instance, however, there is simply no easy course: there is no painless way to either ditch controls or halt inflation.

Following years of inflationary dreams and living off the cuff, it will be difficult for Ottawa to convince the nation that we no longer afford what Prof. Harry Johnson terms the runaway growth of the welfare state. "We must return to the traditional, personal and social values of self-restraint and devotion to hard and productive work, without trying to shift the burdens of taxes and debts to other shoulders and future generations", he says.

Giving greater urgency to Mr. Johnson's prescription is a major new threat to our economy this year which is little recognized and has had little publicity. This threat lies in the coming world trade negotiations known as the Tokyo Round.

Continuing the policy of the former Ford Administration in Washington, the new Carter team is determined to press for major tariff cuts to increase world trade and Western recovery. The view is held that Canada "got away with murder" in the last GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) round of reductions and can no longer expect an easy ride.

This pressure of Canada comes at a time when many Canadian companies as well as unions, are pressing for quotas and greater protection to force up domestic prices and thus cushion high-priced jobs and inefficiencies. This could present us with the greatest trade crisis in Canadian history.

As the Economist reported recently, the message has already gone out from Washington to other Western powers that if they want an economic revival they will have to reduce tariffs and duties to secure a greater freedom of trade. Without this we could face a widespread trade war in which Canada would be the loser. Canadian labor has so far failed to respond to this danger.

According to U.S. Ambassador to Canada Thomas Enders, the completion of the Tokyo Round is expected by the end of the year. As an example of Canada's predicament, whereas Ottawa is being pressed for more protection by Canadian industries the EEC (European Economic Community) proposes to cut its tariffs by 35 per cent and Canada by 43 per cent.

To cap the difficulties which lie ahead for Canada in the next few years, we will also have to borrow tens of billions more foreign capital to finance essential developments. In this prospect the emphasis will have to be on loans for projects which can earn enough profit not only to repay the debt but also the carrying charges.

The days of easy foreign financing for non-productive social services such as roads, bridges, sewers and hospitals can no longer be enjoyed if the nation is to remain solvent.

It is indeed time that Canada took off the "velvet slippers" and put on its workboots again—and the time is overdue for Mr. Trudeau and Finance Minister Donald Macdonald to speak with the "voice of duty" and get the message across to the Canadian public.

Mug thefts bring convictions

Re: The Underground, Queen's University Pub versus Ms. Karen Orlando; Mr. Fraser Stewart; Mr. Randy Giroux; Mr. Ouncan Smith; unnamed respondent
Hearing and Decision: March 16, 1977
Unanimous Decision of the A.M.S. Court consisting of Michael Yarsley, Chief Justice; Brian Newby, Associate Chief Justice; Mike Wilms, Justice; Linda Mollenhauer, Justice; Oeb McGuire, Justice
Written Reasons by Oeb McGuire, J.
Bylaw No. 11, Section 9 (1) states that: "the Court shall exercise jurisdiction regarding...any action by an member(s) of the A.M.S. against the A.M.S. or against any other member(s) of the A.M.S." Pursuant to this provision, notice was given to the Court that five individuals had each been charged with a "Unauthorized Attempt to Remove a Mug" from the Underground, Queen's Pub. The proceedings were initiated by the Manager of the Underground, Jim Russell, and directed towards the A.M.S. Prosecutor who subsequently notified the respondents that they were to appear before the A.M.S. Court. It was decided that since each of the actions stemmed from the same cause, that it would be appropriate to hear them concurrently.

Prior to the actual sitting, three law students introduced themselves, and stated that with the exception of Mr. Giroux, they would be representing the respondents as defence counsel. In addition, the Court granted an order excluding witnesses. Although the Court had considered the respondents individually, on the advice of both counsels, it allowed all of the respondents to remain in the room during the entire proceedings.

Facts
1) The first respondent's name is omitted here pending a decision by the Grievance Board on an appeal requesting its non-publication. The incident in which he was involved took place on January 27th, 1977 at approximately 11:30 p.m. An A.M.S. Constable and the respondent were asked to appear before the Court and give information pertinent to the case.

The A.M.S. Constable stated that he had been leaving the Underground, and had noticed the respondent at the top of the steps with a mug in his hand. Being off-duty, he returned to the Pub, sought the assistance of an on-duty Constable, and the two stopped the respondent and his part on University Avenue between Earl and William Streets. The charge was explained and the respondent was asked for his student card and the mug. He complied without resistance to this request, and the two Constables brought the matter to the attention of the Pub Manager.

The respondent confirmed the Constable's statements. In elaborating on the circumstances leading to the charge, he stated that he had been drinking quite heavily since early in the afternoon of the 27th, and was quite inebriated when he departed from the Underground. The group he was with suddenly decided to leave and go to another Pub, and so the respondent placed a mug full of beer in his pocket, with the intent to drink it en route. He asserted that he had not realized that he was taking the mug; his express concern was to avoid wasting the beer by leaving it behind.

The respondent said however, that he realized he should not have taken the mug, and that he was generally not accustomed to acting in such a manner. He recognized the seriousness of his actions when he was stopped by the Constable, and therefore presented no opposition to their requests.

2) The second respondent, Karen Orlando, was stopped at approximately 10:45 on the evening of January 20th, 1977 at the exit of the Underground. An A.M.S. Constable, the Assistant Manager of the Underground, Ms. Orlando, and a witness for her defence, were asked to appear before the Court and give their accounts of the incident.

The Constable stated that he had been working at the exit door of the Pub that night, checking people's belongings to see that no glasses were removed from the premises. He noted that Ms. Orlando appeared nervous as she approached the door, and as she was carrying a large canvas bag, he stopped her and asked to search it. She seemed upset at being stopped, and was initially reluctant to have her bag searched. The Constable declared that when he found the mug in her bag, Ms. Orlando became extremely disconcerted, though he perceived that she was not surprised at the discovery. At this point he directed her to the office of the Assistant Pub Manager.

The Assistant Manager stated that when Ms. Orlando was brought to him, he explained the charge and requested her student card. She complied, but declared that she had not put the mug in her bag, and had no knowledge of how it had come to be there. When he stated that in all probability she would be asked to come before the Court and pay a fine of about $10.00, she offered to honour the fine at that time in an effort to avoid appearing before the Court. He informed her that this could not be done, and that she would be contacted by the A.M.S. Prosecutor.

Ms. Orlando stated that she had joined her sister and some friends at a crowded table in the Pub and had placed her bag under the table. During the course of the evening she had been absent from the table for extended periods of time. She stated that she left the Pub hurriedly because she realized that she might miss the last bus to West Campus, and so hastily gathered up her belongings and moved towards the door, hoping not to be late. When she was stopped at the door and the mug was discovered in her bag, she was shocked.

In response to the Assistant Manager's statement concerning the fine and Court appearance, Ms. Orlando acknowledged that she had discovered that her sister who had been visiting from Toronto had placed the glass in her bag while Ms. Orlando was absent from the table.

Another student who had been seated at the table said that he had seen the sister place the mug in the respondent's bag at approximately 10:40, but that he had not informed Ms. Orlando of this. He further stated that the respondent was absent from the table at this time, and that as far as he knew, Ms. Orlando never realized that the mug was among her belongings.

3) The third respondent, Fraser Stewart, was charged at approximately 1:45 a.m. on January 22nd, 1977. Two Constables, Mr. Stewart, and a witness for his defence were asked to appear before the Court.

One of the Constables stated that at about 1:30 a.m. he asked Mr. Stewart and his friend to leave the Pub, for it had closed. They had said that they were waiting for a friend to return from the washroom. The Constable returned later and again asked them to leave, whereupon Mr. Stewart swore at him. The Constable forcibly removed the respondent from the Underground, and in doing so, pushed him to the floor. When this occurred, the Constable noticed that beer splashed from an inside pocket of Mr. Stewart's jacket, and he subsequently discovered a mug there. The Constable then took the respondent back into the Pub, and up to the bar area, where he requested his student card. Mr. Stewart refused to relinquish it until another Constable intervened. The Constable added that the respondent was extremely inebriated, made numerous derogatory remarks, and was resisting him.

A second Constable had noticed the disturbance, and joined the respondent and the Constable in the bar area. Because he knew the respondent somewhat, he was able to successfully intervene, and persuade Mr. Stewart to surrender his student card. The Constable added that the respondent was being very uncooperative, and was obviously very drunk.

Mr. Stewart declared that he was too inebriated to remember very much of the night in question, except that he recalled being forced against a wall, and obtaining a taxi upon leaving the Pub.

A witness for Mr. Stewart stated that the respondent had joined his table at the end of the evening, and that when the Constable asked them to leave, they were in fact waiting for a friend. The witness said that while he perceived that Mr. Stewart was inebriated, the latter was able to talk coherently. When the Constable returned, Mr. Stewart drank the beer he had been holding, and subsequently swore at the Constable, which initiated the former's non-violent removal from the Pub, and the discovery of the mug. He continued that a struggle ensued until the intervention of the second Constable.

4) The fourth respondent, Randy Giroux, was charged on January 22nd, 1977 at approximately 1:30 a.m. (although the time of occurrence was disputed by the respondent). Mr. Giroux acknowledged that he was responsible for removing the mug from the Underground, and was willing to accept whatever penalty the Court imposed. He added that everyone at his table had removed a mug from the Pub, and that he had been capable of judging his actions at the time.

5) The fifth respondent, Ouncan Smith, was charged on January 21st, 1977 after being searched by a Constable at the exit of the Underground.

The Constable declared that upon frisking Mr. Smith, he felt what seemed to be a mug in the respondent's inside pocket. When asked the contents of this pocket, Mr. Smith replied that it was a glass. The respondent then began to swear, and refused to produce his student card until the Constable informed him that coercion would be used if necessary. The Constable added that he did not perceive Mr. Smith to have been very inebriated.

Mr. Smith conceded that he had attempted to remove the mug from the premises, but that it was only because he wanted something to drink on the way home. He admitted to swearing at the Constable, and claimed that although he was drunk, he was able to understand and remember what was occurring. Mr. Smith added that he had originally refused to surrender his identification only because he was unsure whether or not the Constable was serious about the matter.

This ended the discussion of the actions. The students representing the respondents declared that these were all strict liability offenses and that the respondents must have had an intent to remove the mugs in order to be held responsible for their actions. In three of the cases, they claimed that the respondents were too inebriated to be capable of judging their actions. They further contended that Ms. Orlando could not be held responsible, for she had no knowledge that the mug was in her bag.

The A.M.S. Prosecutor maintained that rather than intent, knowledge was the key factor in each of these cases, and that each respondent realized that he/she was attempting to remove a glass from the Underground, and must therefore, be held responsible for his/her actions.

The Court reviewed all of the facts and statements of the proceedings, and concluded that, with the exception of Ms. Orlando, each of the respondents was liable to the A.M.S. for his behavior on the occasion mentioned in each instance. In making this decision, the Court felt that the respondents had behaved in a manner contrary to the best interest of the Queen's University community at large; and that the respondents' awareness of this must be a factor in the decision. To this effect, the Court had no alternative but to conclude that Bylaw No. 11, Section 9 (1) had been violated.

Further to these policy considerations, the Court felt that the inebriation of the respondents was not a mitigating factor in any of the incidents. It was perceived that there is a distinction which must be made between awareness and recklessness. The individuals were responsible for their behavior in the circumstances which lead to the specific drunkenness. To allow that a state of drunkenness would absolve a person of the responsibility of his/her actions would result in chaos for the community at large. The Court encouraged this type of irresponsible behavior, as its consequences are obviously contrary to the best interests of the Alma Mater Society.

On the basis of the available information surrounding Ms. Orlando's case, the Court felt that there was no reason to assume that she was responsible for the mug being among her belongings. The Constable's opinion regarding Ms. Orlando's behavior, while based on previous experience in these situations, was not sufficient testimony. Nevertheless the Court notes that the judgment for Ms. Orlando's case does not set a precedent for any future applications of the type; each subsequent case will be decided on the basis of the particular facts involved. However, the Court feels that it must make an attempt to protect the University from abuse which may arise from individuals stating that they had no knowledge that they were removing glasses from the Pub. Consequently, the Court strongly recommends that all students check their belongings before leaving the Underground, for generally, they will be held responsible for their possessions. It is also recommended that this be published, and made well-known to the University community.

Sentencing
The Court allowed submissions in regard to sentencing. Jim Russell, Manager of the Underground, and applicant in these cases, produced statistics for the Court which stated that in the period between September 7th, 1976 and February 23rd, 1977, 2,220 mugs had been lost. After careful accounting he had determined that 25 percent of this loss was due to breakage, leaving the loss at approximately 1,665 mugs and $792.42. He stated that after consultation with the A.M.S. executive, he had attempted to alleviate the situation by posting a sign at the exit which stated that Constables would randomly search Journal. A suggestion raised earlier in the proceedings over whether or not it would be just to enforce the respondents to "work off" their sentence at the Pub, was questioned by Mr. Russell. He believed that if it would be difficult to enforce this type of punishment there has been a reduction in losses since that time, but he maintained that a realistic punishment which could be enforced, must be arrived at by the Court. Otherwise the alternatives would be to either initiate alcohol prices, or to ultimately close down the Underground. Mr. Russell felt that both of these alternatives punished the University as a whole for what he considered to be the extremely selfish acts of a number of students.

The A.M.S. Prosecutor noted that the Underground offered a unique and relatively inexpensive service to students. In light of this, one considers that it is really a case where students are injuring other students. University intellectual qualities, and it was expected that the Kingston community, would also not be accepted by the University. The Court severity of the respondents' actions. The relatively controversial, in that many students regarded the pilferage as "skydiving", as the respondents as unfortunate "guinea pigs", that felt that the punishment must also serve as a deterrent to the rest of the University against further misdemeanors of this nature.

The Constable counsel stated that the Court must keep the issues in perspective and recognize that the losses incurred by the Pub in these cases were minimal. They questioned how far the authority of the Alma Mater Society could be taken as a whole, and added that the publication of the Court's decision, and the embarking of the proceedings would serve as a satisfactory deterrent. To this effect, they supported the imposition of an unsatisfactory fine, or the possibility of working at the Pub as a sentence.

The respondents were given a chance to speak on their own behalf. They asked that the financial standing of the Underground be considered. To a request that the Court consider the respondents' involvement in University activities, the Court replied that this would not be taken into account, it would force the Tribunal members to make moral judgements.

The Court considered all of the arguments. The suggestion that the respondents work at the Underground as a penalty for their actions was discussed and rejected because of the difficulty in involving a section of this kind. Further, the Court recognized that the respondents were only representative of what was occurring in a large scale, and so, in this sense, their culpability is shared by many others.

It was observed that the fact that the respondents had to endure the lengthy and embarrassing of the proceedings, would hopefully have somewhat of a deterrent effect on them. Nevertheless, the Court felt that an immediate and more substantial solution was necessary to reduce and possibly eliminate the losses being incurred by the Underground.

Consequently, for each of the respondents, the Court imposed a fine of $25.00, payable to the A.M.S. Secretary within a week of the proceedings, and the posting of a $50.00 bond which will be redeemable on January 1, 1978. The monetary value of these sanctions is based on the understanding that any subsequent charges of this type, will in all probability, be dealt with more severely. The Court expects these activities to stop, and hopes that this decision will serve as a deterrent.

The Proceedings
The A.M.S. Court, its procedures and decisions, are recognized and sanctioned by the A.M.S. Constitution and the University. As the judicial board of the student body it exercises jurisdiction over all matters within the authority of the Alma Mater Society, and in addition, may establish any rules of procedure which it deems just and necessary. These procedural regulations are available to any member of the Society.

In the course of these proceedings, actions by three senior law students necessitated a more formalized and intimidating atmosphere. The students had failed to investigate the proper procedures of the Court, and by their behavior, hindering the orderly functioning, and the authority of the hearing. The informality of the proceedings was dispelled by the use of legalistic terms and definitions. It should also be noted that the first respondent became so confused by their statements, that he abandoned his students' counsel in the midst of the hearing. By their actions, the students not only acknowledged their disrespect for the Court and its members, but by extending the A.M.S. Constitution and the Society members.

If the procedures of the Court, its structure, or the actions of members of this administrative Tribunal are questioned, there are recognized channels through which complaints can be pursued. Students may not take it upon them selves to attempt to alter Court proceedings by deriding them during the hearings. Those who choose not to abide by the rules of the Court should not appear before it.

More particularly, on the basis of his general behavior during the hearing, and further, on remarks made directly to the Tribunal, Guy Jones, a member of the defence council, was found in contempt of the A.M.S. Court, his penalty being the publication of such infraction in the Journal.

AMS court decision 19

Part II
Written Reasons by Brian Newby, A.C.J.

To avoid confusion I shall state at the outset that I am in respectful agreement with the other members of the Court as to both the findings of fact and the hearing's result insofar as it related to the respondents. I take it, however, that although written reasons must have regard to portance attaches to the flow of thoughts in between: the reasoning process itself. With that in mind, then, the following explanation is not without importance.

The Alma Mater Society of Queen's University, Inc. is a company incorporated under the Business Corporations Act of Ontario. The respondents, as members of the A.M.S., fall subject to the Articles and Bylaws of the incorporated body, and by looking to Bylaw No. 11 one takes notice that the A.M.S. Court shall be the judicial board of the student body, and shall exercise jurisdiction over all matters within the authority of the Alma Mater Society defined per Article I. The relevant provision of that Article is quite broad: "The A.M.S. shall have control over all legitimate enterprises of a non-academic nature". Although the limits to that provision are not immediately obvious, it is clear to the Court that the recognized objects of the A.M.S. would fall within a reasonable interpretation of such language. Elsewhere in Article I it is stated that one of those objects is: "To advance the interests of the students of Queen's University".

The A.M.S. Court, though a court in name and appearance, is not a court. It is rather a judicial board exercising jurisdiction over the legitimate enterprises, and by inference, objects, of the Alma Mater Society of Queen's University. Inc. In national terms, the A.M.S. Court is charged with the oversight of the behaviour of A.M.S. members to the extent that such behaviour affects the interests of the A.M.S. community. For jurisdiction to advance the best interests of the members of this Society.

In the light of the above, the Court's reasoning process becomes more clear, solidifying as the mistaken analogies to criminal courts, or properly constituted courts of any kind, fade away. So too fades the mistaken premise that the A.M.S. Court delves in matters of criminal law. At the hearing, counsel for the respondents spoke in terms of theft, a criminal offence with regard to which the Court clearly lacks jurisdiction. Counsel talked of substantive concepts of culpability. But such words are properly reserved for those persons with standing to engage in the pursuit of criminal justice. Lacking in appreciation for the nature of their surroundings, though counsel for the defence offered many comments, they addressed themselves most intently to the issue before the hearing.

The issue to be properly addressed was whether an unauthorized attempt to remove glasses from the campus pub was seen to be counter to the interests of other A.M.S. members, and if so, if the activity was found to have taken place, with what reaction should the activity be met by the Court. The judgement of Oeb McGuire, specifically addresses these matters. I shall avoid the unnecessary duplicity of discussion.

There is, however, one final matter to be spoken to. It is commonplace to say that judicial tribunals owe a primary regard to the precepts of natural justice and the enurement of fairness in proceedings. The A.M.S. Court is most sensitive to this need. This is especially the case as the Court is caught in a current metamorphosis in proceedings that show both strength and weakness to different aspects of procedural versality system generally less suited to the interests of this community to an inquiry procedure seen as both more just and more fair, because of this that while I cannot agree with the lack of respect for the constitutionally endorsed mechanisms of this Society shown by counsel for the defence, I am moved to endorse at least the spirit of their efforts in furthering the philosophy of fairness in proceedings. By showing their physical presence in opposition to that of the A.M.S. Prosecutor, though no doubt the Court would have ensured fairness regardless, perhaps the physical trappings of fairness were thus further seen to be done.

A second look at saving the seals

Dear Editor:

I have never been moved to this before, but I for one am embarrassed by the disgusting media circus that has recently run out of publicity steam on the ice flow off the coast of Newfoundland. It distressed me deeply as a Newfoundlander and a Canadian and a Queen's student to know that our own Alma Mater Society has contributed one hundred dollars towards this disgusting display of animal welfare emotionalism and media exploitation. I think we should ask ourselves why our AMS has become an institutional member of the Greenpeace Foundation.

I know next to nothing about the Greenpeace Foundation's activities elsewhere, but I'm certainly not impressed with their pack ice repertoire. Whoever heard of such foolishness as painting baby seals green to ruin their furs. I seriously wonder if it crossed their animal-welfare crazed minds to think of how mother seals would react to green babies. The question that should be asked is whether they are concerned with animals or with publicity.

There is no doubt about it. This save the seals campaign is big business. It takes a lot of money to churn up world sentiment and turn it against the poor Newfoundland fisherman. And if Brian Davies is any indication, it is a lucrative business as well. It was not long ago that Brian Davies was just a lowly executive secretary of the New Brunswick Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; now he is a jet-setter who straddles the globe, propagandizing the atrocities of the Newfoundland sealers. I don't suppose that the fact that his income and status is supplemented by his 'Save the Seals' campaign has any influence upon his dedication to the cause. It is interesting to note that Brian Davies commissioned the first film made of the alleged atrocities in the Gulf of St. Lawrence; a film about which there is evidence to suggest that he paid people to skin seals alive. A film which caused a man, a Mr. Henri Stadt, whose only connection with the film was to dub sound, to make his own film because he felt just from viewing the 8000 feet of film that were left out of Davies' movie, that an objective picture was not even intended. Mr. Stadt later went on to film both a slaughterhouse and the seal fishery so as to place the hunt in perspective.

Please forgive me for being emotional, but I am fed up with the misconceptions that have been propagated about the seal fishery, and the supposed barbarity of Newfoundlanders. It is amazing and to their credit that the citizens of St. Anthony have tolerated Mr. Davies as long as they have. But more emotionalism is no antidote to the misunderstandings that already exist about the killing of seals. I would like to clarify some issues.

As I see it three main objections to the seal hunt: (1) that it is cruel, (2) that the seals are an endangered species and (3) that it is wrong to kill them in order, reports, except perhaps those which are commissioned by Brian Davies, have stated that clubbing is the most humane way of killing baby seals. Admittedly no death is pleasant, I have often wondered how pigs feel when they are gassed, their throats slit and hung up to bleed to death or the common trout as he is sportingly reeled in on a hook. However if you want pork or trout, or seals for that matter, you have got to kill them. If you read the reports made by wildlife specialists they state that the baby seals suffer a brain death or are rendered senseless, after all, being babies, their skulls are not fully formed. They are not skinned alive; the fishermen themselves state that it would be an extremely difficult task to skin a wriggling seal. They say it is a hard enough job when they are dead. As for the mother seals being adversely affected by witnessing the killing, many of the scientists have reported that the mothers do not linger over their dead offspring, they tend to wander away immediately without returning.

Again by all scientific reports, the seals are not an endangered species. This is a controlled hunt just like that which is operated for moose or caribou. Besides, what sense would it make to wipe them all out? Newfoundlanders realize that the seals are a renewable resource, just like forests, and fish, which has to be properly managed. This is why there are quotas set on the number of seals that can be killed and why there are government inspectors supervising the activities of every sealing vessel.

There is even evidence to suggest that if there was no hunt the seal herds would have to be culled anyhow, because thermopredator, the polar bear, is in short supply. It is worth remembering that baby seals become adults and that it has been reported that adult seals consume as much as a quarter ton of fish per year. In Caplin alone last year it was estimated that the harp seals consumed 300,000 to 500,000 metric tons which can have a considerable influence on the Atlantic fishery.

The argument that it is wrong to kill seals for their skins is the one I sympathize most with. I do not own a fur coat and I dislike the thought of taking the lives of living creatures for something as cosmetic and luxurious as a fur coat. Yet, it is a question which admits of degree. I do wear leather shoes and a leather belt and I see lots of Queen's Engineering and Arts and Science leather jackets wandering around campus - are these not skins, are they not luxurious and cosmetic? My point is that rather than just condemn the practice of killing for furs perhaps we should be consistent and condemn also the killing for skins in general. Maybe we should even become vegetarians. If it is of any consolation, seal meat is eaten; flipper pie is considered a delicacy in Newfoundland and the meat is canned in three communities.

It should also be mentioned in connection with the objections to the seal fishery that the Persian Lamb Association through intermediaries has been a substantial contributor to Brian Davies' Save the Seals Fund. And you know what the Persian Lamb Association does? They sell lamb skins, which are a prime competitor of seal skins, in the European market.

There are many other issues that should be brought out such as the economic importance of the seal fishery to Newfoundland at a time of the year when there is no other employment. We are talking about $2,000 added to an income of perhaps $5,000 in a province with chronic unemployment as high as 30 percent by some estimates. As for a fake fur factory, this was the most ridiculous suggestion yet that the animal lovers have made. Mr. Weber offered some $400,000 to create a factory, the seal hunt contributed $3,600,000 to the Atlantic economy over a three month period in 1976. But I do not want to go on too long, my point has been to get people to question the motives of Greenpeace and Brian Davies, who are creatures of the hunt just like the Newfoundland fishermen, as well as our Alma Mater Society's support of them. No one is for cruelty to animals or a program ending with their extinction. The fishermen are out to make an honest dollar just like meat packers and tanners are. But if the hunt is not cruel nor threatening the seals with extinction, what are Brian Davies and Greenpeace doing on the ice flows, and worse, why are we supporting them?

Yours truly,

Michael Crosbie

P.S. March 25 I saw on the National News last night, much to my horror, that Brian Davies Save the Seal Fund is worth $500,000!

Checkov's "Gull" takes wing

by Eric Hughes

Checkov has suffered at the hands of his many translators - what foreign language does not suffer when it is squeezed into the English frame of reference? Brenda Anderson of the Drama dept. and Prof. A. Colin Wright of the Russian dept. have been working to alleviate at least a small portion of this problem by translating the Russian writer's "The Seagull." Their translation, while not necessarily in good modern English, will not shun words such as "soul" or "philosophize", words previously anathema to Checkovian scholars. And to see whether their attention to "the rhythms and structures of sentences" is playable, Ms. Anderson will mount an abbreviated version of the script tomorrow at 7:00 p.m. and 9:30, Thursday at 9:30 p.m. and Saturday at 7:00 and 9:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

Ms. Anderson has been very conscious of working physically with the actors, helping them to become more aware of their bodies in space, using ropes and strings to cut off their space, moving to the rhythm of the words - all to reach some sort of honesty in the players' working of the text. Due to departmental space limitations, the company has been forced to work indoors, outdoors, - even in the middle of the frozen lake, at very odd hours. Hopefully, this has added to the sense of ensemble that Ms. Anderson feels is so important to the piece.

The actors are also working with emotional discontinuity, that is, the emotional peaks are reached and then shattered - some of this due to the cutting of the script, but some coming straight out of the Checkovian intent of the play. Hopefully, too, the comic aspects of Checkov will become clearer in this original translation which works at finding the "honesty of response within the theatricality of the production" without "distorting the soul of Checkov." That's this week at the drama department.

A tavern and a shack, but the car won't fit

by Eric Hughes

The Pendragon theatre company is mounting their second full scale production of the season with "Amadee Doucette and Son" a Canadian play by Tom Gallant, dealing with the French speaking peoples of the Maritimes. A truly collective choice, "Amadee Doucette" has a small cast giving the performers a large range in which to play.

Directors Ralph Peter and Phil Tunley worked very closely with the family unit, as this is considered central to the thrust of the play. They treated them as a family, using personal crises and moments of happiness as improvisatory material in an attempt to get the actors to relate their "individual obsessions towards others, and how to relate these to the play."

The play provides a myriad of technical problems which have been solved with a lot of thinking, hard work and just plain good fortune. One section of the play requires the presence of a working car on stage - an effect insisted upon by the author until he was told that it would be impossible to get the car into Theatre 5. He now seems enthusiastically curious about seeing how the play works without the car. To help get over some of the technical difficulties, the set has developed very innovatively. It runs down the middle of the space, dividing the audience in two, with platforms delineating the various areas, i.e. the tavern, the one room shack and a central neutral space that serves a variety of functions.

The co-directors are both enthusiastic about the work of the actors, all of whom are playing against type and are discovering many new things about their own abilities. There is also a strong sense of solidarity in the small cast working against great physical odds to mount what they consider to be a very worthwhile play. It opens April 13 at Brewery Lane, 470 King W. and plays through April 16, curtain at 8:30 pm.

Can schoolroom music still be creative

On Tuesday April 5th, Dr. John Paynter, a composer, writer and music educator of international reputation will speak on "The Role of Creativity in the School Music Curriculum". The lecture will take place at 7:00 p.m. at Harrison-LeCaine Hall (Music Building) on Queen's Crescent.

In the morning he will be at the Faculty of Education for a workshop with student teachers, and in the afternoon at the Music Department to work with undergraduates.

A Senior Lecturer in Music at the University of York in Great Britain Dr. Paynter is responsible for courses and research concerned with Music Education. He is best known as the co-author of Sound and Silence, a series of creative-experiment projects for the classroom. This along with several subsequent books has made considerable impact on approaches to classroom music in both Britain and North America.

One of the highlights of a recent Grant Hall concert was a performance by the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir of Paynter's The Rose. This contemporary setting of a Medieval poem was commissioned by the choir several years ago. Paynter has written many other choral words as well as some music-theatre pieces for children.

composition "Whipping Post" as performed by the band in 1971 in the "live at the Fillmore East" album to appreciate this high charged energy which the group possessed: three minutes of rock music which perhaps can never be equalled.

But that was March of 1971. What has happened since then? The Allman brothers are no more. First Duane and then Berry were killed in tragic motorcycle accidents. The group hired new personnel and continued until the spring. Meanwhile, a whole cult of "Southern Music" bands have sprung up within the past two years, and become quite popular due to their carefully planned promotional work and well-timed releases of their motivations by Phil Walden. The Marshall Tucker band, the Outlaws, Charlie Daniels, and Lynard Skynard to name a few, rose to stardom. All admit a special indebtedness to Duane Allman, Dicky Betts and the rest of the "Brothers" who showed the world how powerful music can be. A new band "Seal Level" has been formed from the remains of the ABB. It's first Capricorn release continues the jazz-blues-rock tradition of Southern music, but, like many other albums

To a newcomer, the most striking feature about the city of Macon, Ga. is its sidewalks. They slope from the buildings down to the street - often at angles which require an effort to walk normally. Macon is a modest community that is about a two hour drive from Atlanta. It is the home of Phil Walden and Associates, who hold the controlling interest of Capricorn Records.

Macon is the home of what has come to be known as "Southern music" - the home of the Allman Brothers Band and other prominent groups that display the breed of music which characterizes itself with free-wheeling, wide open expression. It was the Capricorn studios that

Duane and Greg Allman, Dicky Getts, Berry Oakley, Butch Trucks and Jai Johanny Johnson, recorded their handful of studio albums which, with each passing year, become more and more significant.

The original Allman Brothers Band was the first group to combine inspirational rhythm and vocals with dynamic solo performances. One has only to listen to Greg Allman's by these groups, doesn't seem to possess the energy with which the ABB continually inspired its listeners.

Phil Walden, President of Capricorn Records recently suggested that Bob Dylan should be invited to play at the White House: "I think it would do a lot to symbolize the end of divisions in this country." And the city of Macon just goes on abiding in the warm Georgia Sun.

Bitter Grounds

by Craig Pinchen

The recent year at Bitter Grounds has seen both old and new faces, but the accent has always been on good music. In keeping with past policy, Bitter Grounds provided exposure for performers breaking into the Southern Ontario folk-music scene. Terry Christenson, Ian Tamblin and Tom Akstens are examples of such new talent. Established now, these were but new performers to the Kingston area. Perth County Conspiracy, Cedric Smith, Jackie Washington and John Allan Cameron, all made their initial appearance at Bitter Grounds.

These names reflect the variety of musical styles which have been offered. Bitter Grounds has heard the sounds of blues, bluegrass, jug band, gospel and contemporary-traditional folk music.

A high point would have to be the guest sets performed by Queen's students and the two concluding "student-nights". All of these performances indicated the extent and depth of musical talent available on campus. This will remain one of the Bitter Grounds strong points in years to come.

Next year should see several changes as our profit is put back into the operation of the coffeehouse. These changes will hopefully include improvements to the sound system (a new mixer), the piano (overhauled), the stage (redesigned) and the decor. As well, there will be a change in personnel since the core group of volunteers who have been with Bitter Grounds for the past three years will be graduating. Thus, both new faces and new ideas will be carrying on a tradition at high-level folk entertainment.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all those involved in the success of Bitter Grounds this year, and we hope that next year interest will remain high, and success will continue.

Wayne Marston, Mike Farrel and Sandy Rhind at the Grounds last weekend.

The following is presented in accordance with By-Law 12 Article 5 section 36 of the AMS Constitution.

APPENDIX A

Bylaw No. 23: Rules of Order

Part I: Preparation for Meetings

1. The order of business shall be:
 - (a) Adoption of the Minutes
 - (b) Speaker's Report
 - (c) President's Report
 - (d) Vice-Presidents' Reports
 - (e) Commissioners' Reports
 - (f) Question Period
 - (g) Guest Speakers
 - (h) Business arising from the Minutes
 - (i) New Business

2. (1) The agenda for each meeting shall be prepared by the Executive of Outer Council.
- (2) They shall draw up the agenda from items submitted to the Internal Affairs Commissioner and shall arrange that all business goes forward to Outer Council in properly prepared form.

- (2) Notice of regular meetings shall be made to members of Outer Council at least two weeks before each meeting.

- (3) Any member of the A.M.S. wishing to have items placed on the agenda of a regular meeting of Outer Council must give written notice to the Internal Affairs Commissioner in time to be circulated with the agenda.

- (4) (a) The Internal Affairs Commissioner shall distribute the agenda for the forthcoming meeting in time to reach each member of the Outer Council at least 48 hours before the meeting but in cases of emergency, the President may call a special meeting at any time.
- (b) The agenda will be available at the same time for the public.

- (5) Notice of special meetings of the Outer Council, together with the agenda, shall normally be in the hands of the members of Outer Council at least 48 hours before the meeting but in cases of emergency, the President may call a special meeting at any time.

3. (1) Full minutes of every meeting of the Outer Council shall be taken and kept by the Secretary.
- (2) The minutes of every meeting of the Council shall be made public.

4. All personal reports and other confidential matter contained in minutes, reports or the agenda are to be clearly marked CONFIDENTIAL, and are to be treated as confidential documents until otherwise decided by Outer Council.

5. (1) Copies of all reports shall be in the hands of each member of Outer Council at least 48 hours before the meeting at which the report is to be considered.
- (2) If copies are not in the hands of members by this time the report shall not be proceeded with except at the consent of 2/3 of the voting members present.
- (3) The only exception to this time limit is those reports coming from a special committee which must be submitted to the A.M.S. office one week prior to consideration by Outer Council.

Part II: The Speaker

6. There shall be a Speaker of Outer Council, who shall be appointed in accordance with Bylaw No. 2, section 2, subsection (a).

7. (1) The Speaker shall preside at all meetings of Outer Council and shall preserve order and decorum.
- (2) The Speaker shall not participate in debate.
- (3) (a) The Speaker shall only cast a vote in the event of a tie.
- (b) The Speaker shall always vote to maintain the status quo.

8. (1) Any member, if called to order by the Speaker, or on a point raised by another member, shall yield the floor when the order is being stated.
- (2) All the Speaker's decisions, debate may be entertained on questions of order but must be strictly relevant to the question.

9. (1) If a request for explanation of a point of order, of practice, or of a particular ruling, is made, the Speaker shall state the rules of authority applicable to the case.
- (2) No debate shall be permitted on any rulings.
- (3) Rulings shall be overruled only by a 2/3 vote of members present.

10. (1) The reference source for all points of order or procedure not covered in this Bylaw shall be Bourdoin's Rules of Order, in its most recent edition.
- (2) If a point is raised which is not covered in either of the above, reference shall be made to Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons of Canada, in its most recent edition, which shall be the final authority.
- (3) No rule shall be amended or repealed without a notice of motion having been given during the previous meeting.
- (4) The suspension of any rule of order may be effected without notice by the Speaker, for the duration of the meeting, if fewer than three members object.

11. The Speaker, after having called the attention of the meeting to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance or repelition, may direct that member to discontinue his or her speech.

12. The Speaker shall interrupt any member who makes use of inappropriate language.

13. Upon the absence of a member from two consecutive meetings of Outer Council, notice of this fact shall be sent by the Speaker to the Executive of that member's Faculty Society.

Part III: Substantive Motions

14. All substantive motions shall:

- (a) be seconded.
- (b) commence with the word "That".
- (c) not be preceded by a preamble.
- (d) be preceded by a notice of motion, submitted in writing at a previous meeting of Outer Council, or
- (e) be submitted in writing to the Internal Affairs Commissioner in time to be included in the agenda circulated before the next meeting; or
- (f) be submitted immediately prior to a meeting, at the discretion of the Speaker, but only if sufficient reason can be presented as to why the motion could not have been presented with notice due to circumstances beyond the control of the movers, and that the motion is of sufficient importance that it should be dealt with immediately.

15. (1) A motion may be withdrawn at a meeting by unanimous consent of members present.
- (2) Motions may be withdrawn prior to the meeting at which they are to be discussed, by the Speaker, at the request of the mover of the motion.

16. Any motion that is defeated at a meeting may not be re-introduced, either as a substantive motion or as an amendment, during the current session of Outer Council, except by motion of reconsideration (see section 35).

17. (1) Any amendment may propose:

- a) to delete certain words
- b) to delete certain words and insert others in their place
- c) to insert new words

- (2) An amendment must be moved and seconded.
- (3) Debate of an amendment takes precedence over discussion of the motion being amended.
- (4) One sub-amendment (amendment to the amendment) may be entertained, the discussion of which takes precedence over discussion of the main amendment.
- (5) There is no limit to the number of amendments to a motion which may be proposed, but no amendment which has been defeated may be subsequently re-introduced.
- (6) When an amendment is on the floor, debate shall be limited strictly to the amendment itself; no debate on the main motion shall be entertained until the amendment has been voted upon.
- (7) (a) An amendment may be taken as "friendly" with the agreement of the mover of the motion under consideration and if no member of the A.M.S. present at the meeting objects.
- (b) An amendment considered as friendly shall not require a vote.
- (c) Neither a request to consider an amendment as friendly nor a friendly amendment shall be debatable.

Part IV: Rules of Debate

18. (1) The quorum of Outer Council meetings shall consist of one half of the elected voting members plus one.
- (2) In the event of the above number not being a whole number, then the next highest whole number shall constitute the quorum.
- (3) If quorum is not maintained the meeting shall be adjourned and the time and names of members still present shall be recorded in the minutes.

19. (1) Every member of Outer Council shall rise and address the Speaker when debating.
- (2) All members shall be referred to by their surnames.

20. (1) Either the mover or the seconder of a motion shall be the first to speak in the debate.
- (2) The person who introduced the motion shall also have the right of summation at the end of the debate.

21. (1) No person shall speak more than once during the debate on a particular motion, except for the mover (see Section 20), but such persons may speak to an amendment moved by another person, even if having previously spoken to the main motion.
- (2) No person may speak more than ten minutes without the permission of the Speaker.
- (3) Prior to the cessation of debate, the Speaker shall announce that the debate is being closed.

22. During debate, any member may request that the motion under consideration be read again, as long as this right is not used as a delaying tactic.

23. When a motion is under debate, no other motion, except for procedural motions, may be raised.

24. (1) Guest speakers may answer questions of information and may participate in debate unless members of Council object whereupon a vote shall be taken on the issue.
- (2) A guest speaker is defined as anyone present at a meeting who is not a member of the Society.

25. No person shall interrupt another person except on a point of information, order, or privilege.

26. (1) Any person may rise on a point of information to request factual information concerning the motion under debate.
- (2) All requests for information shall be addressed to the Speaker.
- (3) All replies shall be addressed to the Speaker.
- (4) Neither the question nor the reply shall be considered as a speech to the motion.

27. (1) Any person may rise on a point of order and bring to the attention of the Speaker any violation or departure from the rules or ordinary procedure of Outer Council (see also sections 8, 9, 10).
- (2) A point of order cannot be raised when another point of order is being considered.
- (3) A point of order must be raised when the irregularity occurs.
- (4) If the Speaker finds that a member is not rising on a point of order, he or she shall direct that member to sit down.
- (5) A point of order does not constitute speaking to the motion under debate.

28. (1) Any person may rise on a point of privilege to:

- (a) correct a substantial misinterpretation or misrepresentation of his or her previous speech to the motion; or
- (b) bring to the attention of the Council any personal insult or abuse directed at him or her.
- (c) introduce new members of Outer Council or guest speakers.
- (2) Any voting member wishing to be excused from the remainder of the meeting must rise on a point of privilege and request the permission of the Speaker to do so.
- (3) In general terms, points of privilege refer to all matters affecting the rights and immunities of Outer Council collectively, or to the position and conduct of persons participating in the meeting.
- (4) A point of privilege shall not be considered as speaking to the motion.

29. When the speaker is pulling the question, no member shall walk out of the meeting, or make any noise or disturbance.

30. No member shall reflect upon any vote of Outer Council, except for the purpose of moving that such a vote be reconsidered (see section 35).

31. (1) At the conclusion of debate the Speaker shall call for a vote by show of hands to determine whether the motion shall be accepted.
- (2) If the decision is to be challenged, five voting members must stand to request a formal recount.
- (3) At the request of five voting members, the vote shall be taken by roll call instead of show of hands.
- (4) When a vote is taken at Outer Council, any member may request that the numbers, or names of the minority voters be recorded in the minutes.

32. (1) Standing orders may be passed by Outer Council which shall remain in effect from one council to another unless challenged and defeated by council.
- (2) Standing orders shall be passed after one reading and come immediately into effect.

33. (1) The Executive shall, if it so desires, for certain items of business in which publicity is not in the interests of the Society, put forward a motion to assemble in closed session.
- (2) When in closed session the Speaker shall request that all persons not members of Outer Council leave the Chamber.
- (3) When in closed session Outer Council may call before it any person or persons whose experience or knowledge of the item of business to be discussed will aid Outer Council in reaching a decision.

Part V: Procedural Motions

34. All procedural motions shall:

- (a) be in writing
- (b) be seconded
- (c) commence with the word "That"
- (d) not be preceded by a preamble
- (e) take precedence over debate on the main motion
- (f) not be debatable or amendable
- (g) not be moved by anyone who has previously spoken to the main motion
- (h) constitute speaking to the main motion

35. (1) After any question has been decided, any member may, at the same meeting or first meeting thereafter, move reconsideration of the question.
- (2) Such a motion shall take the form "That the decision taken on motion number (number of motion) of (date of meeting at which the decision was taken) be reconsidered".
- (3) Reconsideration of a decision taken on a motion at a previous meeting shall require a 2/3 vote of members present at that meeting.
- (4) Reconsideration of a decision taken on a motion at a previous meeting shall require a 2/3 vote of all voting members of Outer Council.
- (5) No question shall be reconsidered more than once, nor shall a motion to reconsider be reconsidered.

36. (1) After sufficient debate on a motion, any member may move the previous question.
- (2) Such a motion shall take the form "That the question now be put".
- (3) When the motion is resolved in the affirmative, the main motion and all amendments related thereto are carried to the table and removed from consideration by Outer Council at that time.
- (4) When the motion is resolved in the negative, the main motion is superceded and may not be put until a subsequent meeting.
- (5) A motion of previous question may not be put to an amendment.
- (6) A motion of reconsideration applies to a decision taken on a motion of previous question.

37. (1) Any person wishing to delay consideration of a question may move that the motion be laid on the table.
- (2) Such a motion shall take the form "That this question be laid on the table".
- (3) When the motion is resolved in the affirmative, the main motion and all amendments related thereto are carried to the table and removed from consideration by Outer Council at that time.
- (4) When the motion is resolved in the negative, the business proceeds as if no motion had been made.
- (5) The consideration of any motion laid on the table may be resumed at any time upon a motion to be decided by a simple majority.
- (6) Such a motion shall take the form "That the following question be raised from the table".
- (7) A motion of reconsideration applies to a decision taken on either lay on the table or raise from the table.

38. (1) Any member may at any time move a motion of adjournment of the meeting.
- (2) Such a motion shall take the form "That this meeting now be adjourned".
- (3) When the motion is resolved in the affirmative, all remaining business shall be superceded and the meeting shall end, the time being recorded in the minutes.
- (4) When the motion is resolved in the negative, business shall proceed as if no motion had been made.
- (5) A motion of reconsideration applies to a decision taken on a motion of adjournment.
- (6) Meetings of Outer Council will automatically adjourn at midnight unless a motion to extend the deadline is passed.

Part VI: Committee of the Whole

39. (1) A committee of the whole is ordinarily appointed by a motion "That Outer Council go into committee of the whole to consider (a particular motion or question pertaining thereto)".
- (2) Such a motion is not debatable or amendable.

40. The committee must remain within its terms of reference.

41. (1) When Outer Council enters committee of the whole, a motion may be put forward "That the Speaker leave the Chair".
- (2) If resolved in the negative, the Speaker shall retain the Chair.
- (3) If resolved in the affirmative the Deputy Speaker (see Bylaw 2, section 2, subsection (a)), or failing him, a Chairman immediately appointed by the committee, shall take the Chair and preserve order and decorum.
- (4) If a sudden disorder occurs, the Speaker shall immediately resume the Chair.

42. (1) Members may speak to a motion more than once but only after every other member choosing to speak for the first time has spoken.
- (2) Motions presented shall not be seconded.

43. (1) Having completed debate and voted on the question under consideration, a motion shall be made "That Outer Council move out of committee of the whole".
- (2) The Chairman of the committee shall report to Outer Council the decision taken by the committee.
- (3) Whenever a resolution is reported from any committee of the whole, a motion to concur with the decision taken shall be forthwith put and decided without debate.
- (4) Should such a motion be decided in the affirmative, the main motion shall be considered to have carried.
- (5) Should such a motion be decided in the negative, the main motion shall be considered to have failed.

APPENDIX A

Bylaw No. 24: Committee

Part I: Standing and Special Committees

1. (1) A standing committee is established, and its membership and terms of reference determined by resolution of Outer Council.
- (2) Standing committees are formed to consider continuing questions.
- (3) Once established, a standing committee serves continuously with progressive changes in membership.
2. All committees shall present an interim report to Outer Council at least once every two months.
3. (1) A special committee shall be established, and its membership and terms of reference determined by resolution of Outer Council.
- (2) A special committee shall be appointed for the purpose of examining questions when no appropriate standing committee exists.
4. Upon reception of the final report from a special committee, by Outer Council, the committee shall be considered disbanded.

Part II: Committee Structure

5. (1) A committee is bound by its terms of reference.
- (2) If a committee finds it is desirable to extend or reduce an inquiry beyond the terms of reference which it has been assigned, it shall obtain from Outer Council express authority to do so.
- (3) A motion to concur in a recommendation for extension or reduction of a committee's terms of reference requires notice.
6. (1) The President shall appoint the chairman of each committee.
- (2) He or she shall do so from the membership of the committee unless otherwise directed by the regulations of the appropriate Bylaw or by motion of establishment.
- (3) The chairman shall serve for one year and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Part III: Membership

7. The Executive shall recommend persons for appointment to a committee; appointments must be confirmed by Outer Council.
8. Should any appointments be rejected, Outer Council shall have the right to substitute another person for the appointment provided that a written acceptance of nomination from the person under consideration be tabled.

Part IV: Committee Procedures

9. One half the membership of a committee shall constitute a quorum, if it is a whole number, if not, then the next highest whole number shall constitute a quorum.
10. A committee may, by its own decision have closed or opened meetings.

11. When in closed session the committee shall decide to what extent its members may discuss outside the committee, information placed before it and the views expressed within it.

12. (1) All committees may receive written submissions from any member of the A.M.S.
- (2) Any committee may from time to time hold open hearings at which members of the A.M.S. or person sponsored by an A.M.S. member may present their views and discuss them with the committee.

13. A committee does not require a regular meeting time and place.

14. The committees are encouraged to give progress reports and working papers to Outer Council, at their own discretion, in addition to complying with section 2.

15. If a committee neglects its duties, Outer Council shall intervene and order the committee to meet and report.

Part V: Reports

16. The report of a committee shall be presented by the chairman; if lies upon the table and shall be dealt with as Outer Council may direct.

17. (1) The report submitted to Outer Council is that of the majority of the committee.
- (2) The signature of the chairman of the committee shall appear at the end of the report to attest to the authenticity and accuracy of the report.
- (3) No signatures shall be affixed to a report for the purpose of showing any division of opinion in the committee; nor can it be accompanied by any counter statement or protest by the minority.
- (4) A minority report may appear in the appendix to the report of the committee; but such a paper can be added in this way only with the consent of the committee as a part of its proceedings.

18. A committee report shall not be amended by Outer Council, but it may be referred back to a committee for further consideration, or with instructions to amend the same in some respect.

19. Every committee must submit a final report, in addition to complying with section 4, to Outer Council:

- (a) at the end of the term of office of standing committee members, or
- (b) at the completion of the investigation as expressed in the terms of reference of a special committee

20. (1) Reports may be received by a motion of Outer Council.
- (2) Any interim report which is not received by Outer Council shall be considered to not exist.
- (3) Any final report which is not received shall be considered to not exist and
- (a) a standing committee shall be instructed to write another report; or
- (b) a special committee shall be instructed to write another report; and shall not be disbanded until another report is received by Outer Council (see section 4)

21. (1) Reports to Outer Council may be approved, on a motion, by Outer Council.
- (2) A report and its recommendations may be received but not approved

22. (1) A report is approved in principle; recommendations are approved as specific policy resolutions.
- (2) If a report and its recommendations are approved, Outer Council shall be bound to execute the policy recommendations.
- (3) If a report and its recommendations are not approved, Outer Council shall not be bound by any of the policy recommendations.

23. A report shall be considered in the following manner:

- (a) the report shall be considered for approval in principle, separately from any recommendations attached thereto.
- (b) the recommendations, if there be more than one, shall be considered for approval on an individual basis.

24. (1) A report may be approved in principle, but only some, or none, of the recommendations also approved.
- (2) In this event, Outer Council shall only be bound to act on the recommendations which have been approved.

25. When a report does not contain any resolutions or recommendations, subsequent to its reception and approval in principle, no further proceeding with reference to it, as a report, is necessary.

APPENDIX C

BYLAW NO. 11

The A.M.S. Court

Part I: The Court

1. There shall be an A.M.S. Court consisting of:

- (a) a Chief Justice;
- (b) an Associate Chief Justice;
- (c) three other Justices.

2. In addition to the Court, there shall be a Court officer known as the A.M.S. Prosecutor, appointed in compliance with Section 9 of Bylaw No. 5.

3. Subject to Section 7, at the time of his appointment:

- (a) the Chief Justice shall be in his second year in the Faculty of Law;
- (b) the Associate Chief Justice shall be in his first year in the Faculty of Law;
- (c) the other Justices shall be A.M.S. Members not in the Faculty of Law;
- (d) the A.M.S. Prosecutor shall be in his second year in the Faculty of Law.

(2) The members of the incoming Court shall be called together within two weeks of their appointments by the retiring Chief Justice, who shall instruct them as to their duties in accordance with this Bylaw and established Court procedure.

5. (1) A Justice or Prosecutor may be removed from office by Outer Council, on the recommendation of the Grievance Board, by a two-thirds (2/3) majority vote of the total voting members of Outer Council.

(2) A Justice or Prosecutor may be removed from office by reason of:

- (a) behaviour not becoming a member or officer of the Court;
- (b) inability to perform his duties satisfactorily.

(3) A matter under this section shall be considered by the Grievance Board on the direction of Outer Council, and Outer Council

- (a) may so direct of its own volition;
- (b) shall so direct on receipt of a petition signed by at least two hundred (200) members of the A.M.S. requesting such a direction.

(4) On receiving a direction under subsection (3), the Grievance Board

- (a) shall, within twelve (12) teaching days, hold a hearing regarding the matter at which evidence and submissions shall be accepted from all interested parties;
- (b) shall, no less than one calendar week prior to the hearing, notify personally each party threatened with removal of the time and place of the hearing;
- (c) shall, in the event that the direction was made in accordance with paragraph (b) of subsection (3), cause the time and place of the hearing to be published in at least one edition of the Journal issued no less than one calendar week prior to the hearing;
- (d) on the basis of the evidence and submissions at the hearing, shall, within twelve (12) teaching days of the hearing, make its recommendation to Outer Council.

(5) Should more than one of the Justices come under review, so as to preclude the court's functioning in accordance with subsections 1 and 2 of Section 11, the Grievance Board shall assume the duties and functions of the Court pending a final outcome of the matter.

(6) Non-compliance with any provision in this section will render any subsequent actions and determinations null and of no effect.

6. A Justice or Prosecutor may resign on two weeks' notice in writing to the Internal Affairs Commission.

7. (1) In the event that any Justice or Prosecutor is unable to complete his term of office, Outer Council shall determine how, if at all, to fill the vacancy.

(2) Should the position of Chief Justice become vacant, the Associate Chief Justice shall assume the role of Chief Justice until such time as that position may be filled otherwise by Outer Council.

(3) Should the position of A.M.S. Prosecutor become vacant, the Chief Justice shall appoint an interim Prosecutor until such time as that position may be filled otherwise by Outer Council.

8. (1) The Chief Justice shall be in charge of the Court, and shall be responsible to Outer Council for its proper functioning and conduct.

(2) The Associate Chief Justice shall carry out the duties of the Chief Justice in his absence, and shall, along with the other Justices, assist the Chief Justice to fulfill his responsibility to Outer Council.

(3) The A.M.S. Prosecutor shall assist the Court to perform its adjudicative functions effectively in accordance with the Rules of the Court made pursuant to Section 17, but shall be a functionary of the Internal Affairs Commission not subject to the provisions of subsection (2) of Section 15.

(4) In addition to his role with respect to the Court, the Chief Justice is the Chief Electoral Officer in accordance with the provisions of Bylaw No. 10, and is a member of the Constitutional Review Committee in accordance with Section 7, of Bylaw No. 5.

Part II: Jurisdiction

9. The A.M.S. Court shall be the judicial board of the student body, and shall exercise jurisdiction over all matters within the authority of the Alma Mater Society as defined by Section 4 of Article 1; and, in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the Court shall exercise jurisdiction regarding:

- (a) any violation of an appropriately published rule or regulation in the University, for which purpose appropriate publication can be accomplished by one or more of:
 - (i) incorporation into the A.M.S. Constitution;
 - (ii) incorporation into the constitution, manual, handbook or similar such documents of any student organization, any Member Society specified in Section 1 of Article 11, and any University residence;
 - (b) any failure to comply with the directions of a University official acting within the scope of his authority;
 - (c) any violation of the civil or criminal law which affects the orderly functioning of the University;
 - (d) any faculty grievance with respect to A.M.S. decisions;
 - (e) any action by Outer Council against any member (s) of the A.M.S.;
 - (f) any action by any member(s) of the A.M.S. against Outer Council or against any other member(s) of the A.M.S.;
 - (g) any grievance by any member(s) of the A.M.S. with respect to the payment of refunding of the Student Interest Fee;
 - (h) any appeal against a decision of the Executive Committee of the A.M.S. Housing Service concerning a dispute between any student tenant(s) and the Service;
 - (i) any dispute arising from the Leonard Field Residence Society Committee;
 - (j) possession and/or consumption of alcoholic beverage other than in areas where specifically permitted;
 - (k) interference with A.M.S. Constables during the performance of their duties;
 - (l) damage to property and/or public disturbance that would tend to bring the A.M.S. into disrepute;
 - (m) contempt of the Court;
 - (n) (i) on the request of Outer Council as a reference to the Court; or
 - (ii) in the ordinary exercise of its jurisdiction under this section;
 - (o) the performance of express court functions outlined elsewhere in this constitution, that, in section 2 of Article 6, section 1 of Bylaw No. 10 and section 9 of Bylaw No. 18.

Part III: Exercise of Jurisdiction

10. The Court shall hear all matters brought before it pursuant to this Bylaw and shall render decisions thereon to the best of its ability.

11. (1) All decisions shall be effected by the Justices sitting alone.

(2) A quorum of the Court shall consist of three (3) Justices, one of whom must be either the Chief Justice or Associate Chief Justice.

(3) The normal rules of law will apply in reaching a decision, so that a majority opinion decides a question, while an even division of opinion fails to do so.

- (4) (a) In the event of an even division of opinion, the matter (i) may, at the Court's discretion; and (ii) shall, on the written request of any party to the matter, be adjourned for consideration by the whole Court.
- (b) For the purposes of paragraph (a)(ii), the written request may be informal, but shall be signed by the party submitting it and tendered to the senior Justice hearing the matter.

(5) A decision, with supporting reasons, may be rendered orally at the time of the hearing, and shall be rendered in writing as soon thereafter as possible.

12. (1) Notwithstanding Section 11, matters involving only members of the Graduate Students' Society shall be heard and decided by a Court consisting of the Chief Justice, the Associate Chief Justice, and the Chief Justice of the Graduate Students' Society; in all other respects, Section 11 applies.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the Chief Justice of the Graduate Students' Society shall be deemed to be a Justice of the A.M.S. Court.

13. (1) Normally, matters brought before the Court should arise in the Kingston area, especially on and around campus.

(2) Off-campus matters may be heard or not at the discretion of the Court, and, in exercising that discretion, the Court shall have regard to:

- (a) the willingness of the parties to have the matter decided by the Court;
- (b) whether or not A.M.S. Constables were involved;
- (c) whether civil or criminal action has been or is likely to be instituted with respect to the matter;
- (d) the impact that the matter has had or is likely to have (in the Court's opinion) on the operation and/or reputation of the Alma Mater Society.

14. (1) Any proceedings, other than those under paragraph (n) of Section 9, must commence within sixty (60) days of the occurrence out of which the matter arose.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), matters arising outside the normal academic year may be proceeded with within thirty (30) days of the beginning of the next normal academic year.

15. (1) Decisions of the Court shall not be varied or reversed by any body or officer of the Alma Mater Society.

(2) The Court is not to be considered part of any A.M.S. Commission, and is to remain as independent as possible of all other functionaries of the Alma Mater Society.

(3) Decisions of the Court with respect to student discipline are appealable to the Grievance Board.

Part IV: Sentencing Powers of the Court

16. The following sanctions may be imposed by the Court:

- (a) censure;
- (b) disciplinary probation for a period not exceeding twelve (12) calendar months from the date of the decision regarding which sentence is imposed;
- (c) restitution;
- (d) suspension of privileges;
- (e) deposit, for a period not to exceed twelve (12) calendar months of an amount, not to exceed three hundred dollars ($300.00), payable to Queen's Alma Mater Society and forfeitable upon subsequent breach of disciplinary probation or upon commission of a subsequent offence under Section 9 as found by the Court;
- (f) fine, not to exceed three hundred dollars ($300.00), payable to Queen's Alma Mater Society;
- (g) recommendation of suspension;
- (h) recommendation of expulsion.

Part V: Miscellaneous

17. (1) The Court may, by unanimous approval of its member Justices, make Rules with respect to matters coming within its jurisdiction:

- (a) for regulating the procedures of the Court;
- (b) providing for officers of the Court and defining their duties.

(2) Any rules made pursuant to subsection (1) shall be published, for which purposes, publication can be accomplished as specified in paragraph (a) of section 9.

18. (1) Every written decision of the Court shall be published in full in the Journal as soon as possible after being rendered.

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (a), a decision may be edited for or withheld from publication at the discretion of the Court.

19. A copy of each of the following shall be kept by the Chief Justice for availability, on request, to any member of the Alma Mater Society:

- (a) an updated edition of the A.M.S. Constitution;
- (b) an updated edition of the Court Rules;
- (c) a correct edition of every A.M.S. Court ruling on record as of the coming into force of this section, and every court ruling made thereafter.

Coach calls on canine

Canine Kiwi on the prowl

by Tom Shand

Queen's jolted Gaels football coach Dug Hardgrooves today announced the signing of Kanine Kiwi, a fleet-footed runner from O.H.S., to a multi-year agreement.

Hardgrooves explained that, "Although we have a kennel filled with good stock, we feel she will add an extra dimension to our ground game. She has a broad base going through the line, can cut well off any leg and is a good roll blocker."

Kanine declined to comment on his feelings about the new deal but her agent, Terry Collins, commented that "It is about time football broke down some of its barriers and let talent be its own criterion for judgement."

Collins himself is a bit of a human interest story. As you may recall Collins graduated from Queen's University with a Commerce degree in 1977, a year in which he also edited the Queen's Journal. It was expected that T.C. would continue on in journalism but as he said repeatedly at today's press conference "Times are tough. Sometimes you have to take a chance and go where the money is."

WIC Banquet a success

by Carolyn Corrigan

At the WIC Wind-up, banquet style, 3 silver trays (which are awarded to those who accumulate 300 points in WIC) were given to Wendy Earl, Jan Schultze, and Lynda Henderson. We had fourteen level-two award winners and twenty-two winners of the Queen's mugs (four level-one award).

Winners of the Marion Ross Tro, $4 (for unit participation) this year were, to the great surprise and happiness of many, the Rehab girls. The competition for first place has been closely contested throughout the year by Rehab, PHE 77, and Arts '80. Rehab won with a total of 791 points, followed closely by Arts '80 (with a total of 761), and PHE 77 (with a total of 747). Arts 78 gained the fourth place standing with 534 points.

Other results announced at the banquet were: Ice Hockey: Law won the hockey championship this term and Rehab placed second; Volleyball, first place was taken by PHE 77, Free Throw, an individual sport won by Leslie Pollock of Engineering.

Another added attraction of the night was the introduction of next year's WIC executive. These members include: Madeline Pavelka as director, Carolyn Corrigan as chairman, Karen Kinsella and Lynda Catto for Publicity, Nancy Woods and Judy Mitchell for Awards, and Cathy Jonstun for officials. It appears as though we are going to have an excellent committee next year—of course, how could it be otherwise with me as chairwoman? Seriously though, it will be a difficult job to try and surpass the accomplishments of this year's committee. They have provided WIC with a super year of successful activities, and participation has never been greater. I would like to thank them for their example. Special mention should also be made of the tremendous effort of this year's chairwoman, Wendy Earl, of Linda Wiggins and the PHE 77 faculty in general, we are most definitely going to miss your enthusiasm next year.

Collins humbly signed Kiwi as a hardship case from the Society (O.H.S.) but does most of her recruiting in the wilds of Greater Metro's (Toronto) tough North East end.

Apparently we will hear more from Collins before year's end as Coach Worthlessness of the Groping Grapplers, also of Queen's University, has expressed interest in Jumpin' Jack, another of Collins' clients. Jumpin' is a lightweight who is very quick on his feet and fought for the Marsupials in the Australian Division of the Zoo City League for the past three years. Jumpin' Jack has a sentence and has been behind bars but Worthlessness appeared confident that terms for probation could be arranged.

Principal Roll Whats summed up the feelings of the university towards the trend of recruiting this new breed of competitors when he said, "Holy Jumpin'! This is a whole new kettle of fish. I remember I had this Walrus I sailed with once...I wonder. So do I Whattsy, so do I."

Bonspiel ends season

by Steve Ricketts

The 1976-77 intercollegiate mixed curling season was brought to a close last weekend at the University of Toronto Mixed Curling Championships. George Cooke, Gilbert Dawson, Ken Kozlik, Stephen Ricketts, and Tom Turnbull all skipped teams in the bonspiel, for which there were 3 qualifying games to determine the top four teams who would play for the title; the next four teams would form the second division and these teams would play 2 more games to decide the winners.

Arctic Penguins cover expenses

Thousands of people have been eagerly watching and listening to the continuing saga of the Arctic Garden Penguins, the women's hockey team who travelled to Halifax several weekends ago. The team, made up of experienced players from Queen's University, has been busy raising funds to cover the cost of the trip through a raffle and movie (The Longest Yard). At press time, the winner of the raffle was not yet known; however, the lucky individual's name will be posted in the PHE Centre today. Thanks to the generous support of the students, faculty, and staff of Queen's University and of course, Bar-Well Foods of Montreal, the Penguins have been successful in raising sufficient funds to cover the cost of the trip. The Penguins would especially like to thank Greg Doyle, Eddie Deans, Dr Don Macintosh, Padre Laverty, the MBA Society - its students and staff, Gill Cooper, Dean Reid, Hugh Lawford, Andy Reddick, members of Queen's Inter-collegiate teams and all others who helped us out when the chips were down.

Besides winning the championship, we had a really great time! We already have been invited back next year and plan to return to defend our championship. Perhaps next year we will be able to go as official representatives of Queen's University.

The bonspiel also closed a winter of curling for the Queen's Curling Club, which had a very successful year. Ray Walkowiak emerged the club champion, defeating John Harris, Gilbert Dawson and Ken Kozlik won the opening bonspiel, and the all-night bonspiel was won by Tom Turnbull and Steve Ricketts. Hopefully next year will be even better. I wish Kathy Stewart all the luck.

Air disaster

On Sunday, March 27, the worst air disaster in aviation history occurred in the Canary Islands as two Boeing 747's collided on a foggy runway. All the passengers of the Dutch KLM plane and most of the passengers of the American Pan Am plane were killed, with a total of 578 dead.

The two planes, which were carrying tourists on charter flights, were derouted to the Canary Islands airport after a terrorist bomb blast took place at the airport they were supposed to land at. The planes were brought in for refueling and both landed with no problems.

When the planes were ready for takeoff again they began taxiing down the runway, the Pan Am jet following the KLM jet. The KLM plane was told to turn off at an intersection before starting its takeoff run. It appears that instructions got muddled at this point. The Pan Am plane had not yet turned off the runway before the KLM plane started taking off. The Dutch 747 was unable to clear the American plane and crashed through it.

An official investigation is now underway to uncover why the accident took place. There is a controversy over which intersection the Pan Am plane was to turn off at, and whether or not permission to take off was asked for or given to the Dutch plane.

PQ language policy

On Friday the Parti Quebecois tabled its language policy in the National Assembly. The policy, if implemented, will make Quebec a totally French speaking province. French will be spoken in courts, government Municipalities, the school boards, the public service, and at work.

All children must attend French schools except children who have at least one parent who studied in an English Quebec elementary school. The mother-tongue of the parents will no longer matter. All firms must have French names. Firms that operate outside Quebec can have an English name, but must use a French name in Quebec.

Any company with 50 or more employees must obtain a certificate by 1983 stating that it is implementing a program for creating a French milieu. Companies with over 100 employees must set up a committee consisting of, at least one-third employees to oversee the francization process.

The paper says little about the rights of English-speaking Quebecers, leading some leaders to feel that the community faces eventual extinction. John Ciaccia, Liberal member of the National Assembly said the PQ "has de facto separated from the rest of Canada."

New budget

The latest federal budget was released last Thursday night by Finance Minister Donald MacDonald. It appears that wage and price controls will not be phased out before next October at the earliest. MacDonald feels that removing controls now would result in worse escalation of wages and prices.

The government will spend about $100 million to create new jobs through various programs, employing about 50,000 people. There have been some tax cuts, both for businesses and private Canadians. Tariffs will be reduced for certain imports, such as coffee, from developing countries.

Mr. MacDonald said that the Government is holding back on its spending - its rate of growth is 9.8%, less than the growth rate of the gross national product. However, a deficit of over $6 billion has been budgeted for.

Quebec opinion

Recently a survey was conducted for Sunday Morning, a CBC news program, to find out how Quebecers felt about independence. The survey was conducted from February 24 to March 2, just after Trudeau's trip to Washington. Of the 1200 homes contacted 744 replied.

The survey expressed a very high level of satisfaction with the present provincial government, but was split on how well people thought things were going. On the question of federal elections, 36.5% would vote Liberal, 12% PC, 6% NDP and 5% SC with 29% undecided. For provincial elections 15% would vote Liberal 13% Union Nationale, 39% PQ and 28% undecided.

When asked whether they would vote for complete separation, 16.6% were in favour, 66.4% against and 15.4% undecided. This shows an increase in opposition since the last referendum held in November, with most of the change coming from the undecided. When asked if they would favour separation with an economic association with the rest of Canada, 32% were in favour, 52% against and 15% undecided.

Dr. Maurice Pinard, the Montreal professor who conducted the survey, concluded that Quebecers want independence, but are unwilling to pay for it.

Instant info

Canada's only significant computerized information service is based in Kingston. QL Systems Ltd., operated by a former Queen's professor, Mr. Lawford, and his partner Mr. von Briesen, can supply facts and statistics from 35 data bases. The 25 member staff of the head office here in Kingston operate and feed an IBM computer located in Ottawa. Their system is fast and cheap, it only costs $1 for every sign-on to a data base and then only $1 more for every search made within the base. This can be compared to the $300 cost for each such search in some US companies.

The firm plans to relocate at the end of the month to 797 Princess Street and to add an IBM 370 138 computer. As well as its main office here in Toronto it has one in Ottawa and one in Toronto, with 5 employees to staff them.

Rideau slowdown

A decrease in traffic on the Rideau canal was noted last season. Vessel usage dropped in 1975 17% from 1974, and in 1976 it dropped a further 22% from 1975. Four reasons are cited for the most recent decrease: poor boating weather in 1976, the US

Bicentennial festivities plus the premium of the Canadian dollar, increased fuel costs and the new tolls of 1975 which were continued in 1976. Total traffic last year was 6,500 boats, 33% of which were American.

City parking

The president of Kingston's Downtown Business Association spoke last Wednesday to the city transportation committee and informed them that between $5 and $6 million are needed to correct the parking problems in the city core. He feels an additional 2,500 spaces are needed and should be provided by multi-level parking garages.

New radio services

CBC-Radio began piping its French and English AM radio programs to Kingston last Sunday. A repeater station is broadcasting Toronto's English and French Network programming, respectively on 107.5 and 99.5 on the FM dial. The stations play from 6 am to 1 am and are virtually commercial-free. They will be broadcast in stereo in the future, and French language television station will start broadcasting in Kingston on Channel 22 sometime this summer.

CFMK-FM will stop its fifty-five hours per week of CBC-AM material. CKWS will gradually phase out its twenty-five hours per week of CBC-AM broadcasting. A CBC studio might possibly be set up in Kingston in the future.

Odds and ends

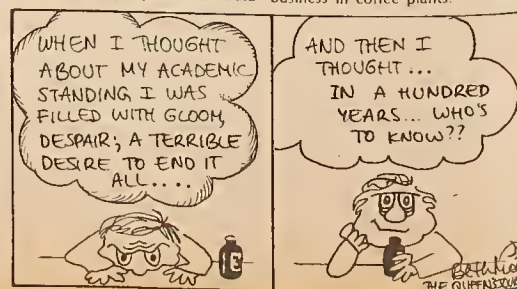

According to English reports, an engineer is trying to raise $10 million to back an attempt to raise the sunken liner Titanic. He plans to make the ship float to the surface by converting surrounding water to gas with a powerful electric current. There are a few minor problems involved: the gases produced would be highly explosive, the salt would turn to poisonous chlorine and corrosive sodium hydroxide would also be created. Worth it?

In Dallas you can dial-a-porno-film and projectionist for thirty dollars. For $40 the projectionist (male or female) will work topless and for $50 with no clothes at all. City hall is considering bringing back an old ban on showing porno films within 300 yards of a school or church.

It seems that coffee addicts in London are growing their own. Plant stores have been doing a booming business in coffee plants.

DEUTSCH CENTRE DEMOLISHED

Once billed as "The Ninth Wonder of the World", the John Deutsch Centre has been dismantled and sold to an Arizona businessman. Vice-Principal Bonham cited financial constraints as reasons for the liquidation, adding "Hey mister, you like our Physics Building?"

JOE COLLEGE GOES TO THE BATHROOM

PURDY, LE PAGE EXPOSE THEMSELVES

Many people are misled by Kirk Purdy's physical insignificance. Be assured, however, that he is a true Napoleon in the best traditions of Howard Smith and Hugh Christie. Kirk came into this world in the back seat of a taxicab several years after the date on which he usually claims to have been born. His childhood was quiet, normal (unless one believes the people from the Humane Society) and in fact quite boring. Kirk did manage to retain an uncommon fascination with his genitals well into adolescence. His other qualifications for the Golden Words editorship included schizophrenia and a lifetime subscription to "Lotsa Lafts" magazine. Everybody expects big things from Kirk -- already his letters of apology have become collector's items around campus. Graduation and "spending more time in MacDonald Park" are Kirk's aims for the next few years. Chief among his long-term ambitions are growing and graduation.

Very little is known about Dan LePage except that he is rumoured to be a latent heterosexual.

IT'S A HOWLER!

Exploring the inner reaches of ourselves.....

Joe College goes to the Bathroom

After footing the oftentimes exorbitant fees of landdivers, mountain climbers, Artsci hunters, devil-may-care vacationers and animal trainers, it came as quite a pleasant surprise to the G.W. Editors to learn that our own Joe College is a fairly accomplished amateur in his own particular field of thrill-seeking. We follow Joe through what has become for him a rather commonplace passtime and marvel at his cool-headedness in the face of incredible odds.

1 Joe begins the day early marshalling his supplies for the tiring expedition.

5 For a single, tense moment, Joe is thwarted by nature. But in the end his skill and dexterity triumph. The scene is set for his display of daring and raw, virile courage.

2 After careful planning and provisioning, Joe is on his way. He whiles away the time by humming World War I marching songs.

6 At last, the moment of truth has arrived. Drum roll please.....

3 A confusing and difficult trail causes Joe to stop for a moment in which to ponder his choices.

4 Oh, that critical moment of uncertainty! Joe goes over his alternatives once again before he has the situation firmly in hand.

Thank Heavens! All has gone well. Joe, understandably takes a few minutes to recover from the strain. Never one for somber moods, Joe was heard to quip, "The job's not finished until the paper work's done."

8 Joe straightens his khaki expedition garb in preparation for his triumphal return to the G.W. Office Tower and the traditional hero's welcome.

9 Joe cleans away the emotional stain his experience has caused him and ponders his next foray into the dangerous and unknown.
